THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
JANUARY 1, 1894.

OUR YEAR OF JUBILEE.

THE first number of THE MUSICAL TIMES appeared on June 1, 1844, and on June 1 next this journal will have been in existence for half a century. Obviously the occasion is one for remark at the beginning of the volume in which the Jubilee number will appear, and we shall make it the opportunity not only for a brief survey of the past, but also for statements with reference to the future. A first and most pressing feeling, however, is one of satisfaction—nay, even of gratitude, at having been spared to attain what, for a class journal, is a venerable age. A Jubilee in this department of artistic labour comes as an extremely rare event, having indeed, as far as England is concerned, occurred but once before—namely, on March 10, 1886, when our late contemporary, the Musical World, attained its fiftieth year. Our predecessors were comparatively short-lived. The Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review lasted ten years only (1818—1828); and the Harmonicon had the same short span of existence (1823—1833). As for our present contemporaries, they are all our juniors by considerable spaces of time. The Musical Herald (formerly Tonic Sol-fa Reporter) is now in its fortieth year; the Musical Standard was thirty in 1892; the Monthly Musical Record is a young creature of twenty-two. The others are infants. Having these facts in mind we are justified in indulging some measure of content with Fortune, which has preserved us from, at any rate, mortal harm through fifty years. May we not ask, too, for the congratulations of our friends? When an individual has passed into the sere and yellow stage, one hardly knows whether birthdays should be an occasion of congratulation or condolence, for if another year has been added to life, the inevitable end, not far off at best, is by so much the closer. But the friends of THE MUSICAL TIMES have no such consideration to trouble them. In this case the individual is nothing. One editor succeeds another, the places of contributors as they become vacant are filled by fresh men, and so, all other things being favourable, the vitality of the organisation continues. For ourselves, we feel that if THE MUSICAL TIMES be old in years it is young in heart and enterprise; if it be the doyen of the English musical press, it is not one for relegation to the armchair in the chimney-corner. Saying this, we who now combine to carry on the work of the journal simply show the spirit of our predecessors, which has, from the first, been a spirit of discontent with things achieved and of desire for higher and better results.

THE MUSICAL TIMES was directly born of the great movement for popular musical education which began with the fifth decade of the present century, and was represented chiefly by Joseph Mainzer and John Hullah. Only a minority of existing amateurs can remember the wave of excitement which passed through the land when "music for the million" became a fact. The present writer, though then a schoolboy, is able to recall circumstances which, were he to relate them, would show the existence of a genuine English "craze." When music classes sprang up in every little town and village, the population rushed to them with one accord. Old and young, people with voices and without them, people who "liked" music, and others who merely desired to be in the fashion—all followed Mainzer or Hullah, as the children of Hamelin trooped after the Pied Piper. Out of this came THE MUSICAL TIMES, first as a kind of organ of Joseph Mainzer, and then in the more regular and definite form which marked the beginning of its proper journalistic life. The position, at the outset, was not free from danger. Crazes of every kind are followed by sharp reactions, and when it was found that knowledge of music could not be obtained without effort, and that systems were powerless to create faculties, the new movement experienced a decided check. Enough of public spirit, however, was left for the sustenance of this journal and the danger passed away.

Our younger readers will certainly be interested in a description of the first number of The Musical Times. It is a little sheet of eight pages, headed "The Musical Times and Singing-Class Circular. Published on the 1st of every Month. Price 1½d.," and subscribed, "London: Printed by Thomas Richards, 100, St. Martin's Lane, in the Parish of St. Martin, Middlesex, and Published by J. Alfred Novello, at 69, Dean Street, Soho, County of Middlesex." We will indicate the contents of the pages in their order. Page 1: Conditions of publication, and a notice to correspondents regarding communications to the Editor. A leading article, entitled "The Amateurs of London," contrasting the hopeful circumstances of the time then present with the fact that, twenty years earlier, the "Classical Harmonists"—pioneer amateur society of London—could not muster twenty members competent to take a part. Page 2: Mr. Novello's announcement of a series of "Cheap Classics," including Spohr's "Last Judgment" (7s. 6d.), Mozart's Masses (2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. each), and Haydn's Masses (4s. and 6s. each). A "Brief Chronicle of the Last Month." Pages 3 to 6: Music of Purcell's "In these delightful, pleasant groves," and advertisements of Mr. Novello's publications. Page 7: A "Brief Chronicle, continued," being short paragraphs devoted to current musical events. Page 8: List of Concerts for the month, and advertisements. From this tiny germ, the journal of magazinelike proportions which the reader now holds in his hand has developed through a course of fifty years.

We go on to indicate the various stages of growth.

The original eight pages of The Musical Times were not exceeded till, on February 1, 1848, the journal underwent its first enlargement. (By the way, it is curious to note that Nos. 42 and 43 appeared together, for the accommodation, perhaps, of Rossini's "Ode to Pius IX.," which took up nine pages. Those were the days when the author of the famous "Non possumus" was supposed to be a Garibaldi in ecclesiastical vestments.) In the March number, "The Enlargement of The Musical Times" was the subject of a special article, in which we read: "The increasing number of the patrons of The Musical Times has made them (the proprietors) resolve permanently to enlarge the work (without additional price) to twelve pages. . . . It is no small gratification to the proprietors to have this opportunity of thanking its kind patrons." The journal now came out with lengthy reviews; and a report of a general meeting of the Sacred Harmonic Society, in addition to its old and carefully, as well as wisely, preserved features. With the March number, moreover, three Anthems by Vincent Novello were given.

Between the beginning of 1848 and the middle of 1851, vast improvements were made in the "get-up" of the paper, and towards the close of the period sixteen pages were sometimes issued. This indicated a need for further permanent enlargement, but though, for a special reason, an issue of twenty-four pages took place in July, 1851, no announcement of a definite change was made till, in December, 1853, the proprietors stated: "The present number extends to twenty pages, which enlargement, it is expected, will be maintained throughout the coming musical season." The music in this issue was "The Roast Beef of Old England," led up to by a lively article on "The inexhaustibility of the subject of Christmas," from the pen of Leigh Hunt.

In July, 1865, a new fount of type was used, and a more modern appearance secured, but it was not till January, 1868, that a really "epoch-making" change took place. Then The Musical Times came out with thirty-two pages, and the price, which remained at the original three-halfpence during twenty-four years, was raised to twopence. Simultaneously with its enlargement, reviews of new music were added to the long-standing features of the journal. As might have been foreseen, this evidence of success—than which nothing succeeds so well—made necessary, after no long time, another expansion. In January, 1877, the then Editor, Mr. H. C. Lunn, stated in the course of an address "To our Readers": "For nine years no alteration has been made in the size of this journal; but its growth during this time, not only in circulation, but in public estimation, has been so decisive that its further enlargement now becomes an imperative necessity." The Editor went on to say that The Musical Times would thenceforth consist of forty-eight pages; the price being raised from twopence to threepence.

Our retrospect has now come within the memory of even young subscribers, and there is no need to dwell upon what remains; enough that, in January, 1885, our journal was again permanently enlarged (this time to sixty-four pages) and issued at fourpence.

The foregoing is a record of steady success; none of the changes being due to the anxiety of new proprietors to make a fresh start, but having their origin in public demands, expressed through customary and unerring means. The desire all along has been to keep pace with the development of musical intelligence and taste, and to make this journal representative of the period in which it is issued. Now the question arises: "What next, and next?" Have the forces making for improvement through fifty years exhausted themselves? Have we reached the stage of finality, prepared to rest and be thankful? That is not the situation in actuality, nor is it a consummation we desire. The law of progress continues, and we must go with it. Especially should something be done to mark the year of our Jubilee; at once crowning the edifice of the past and giving an earnest of the future. For these reasons The Musical Times now appears under the following improved conditions:

I. Enlarged type in several important sections, as, for example, in the article now under the reader's eye.

II. Thicker paper, of better quality and more pleasant to handle. Each number to be issued cut open.

III. A permanent enlargement to seventy-two pages, or nine times the original size.

IV. The issue, with each number, of a musical Supplement, in addition to the usual musical pages. This will contain an important composition, and virtually increase the size of the journal to eighty pages.

We must add that the price will not be changed, and that various improvements of a different character to those mentioned have been determined on. The regular series of articles entitled "From my Study" (interrupted this month by the illness of the writer) will remain a feature, dealing immediately with a fine collection of musical portraits, some of the rarer or more interesting among which we hope to reproduce.

The paragraphs in "Facts, Rumours, and Remarks," a feature of the paper which has been very successful, will henceforth be written by Mr. Joseph Bennett, over his own signature, and with such modifications of style and form as may appear adapted to strengthen their popularity. Another important departure will consist of Interviews with leading musicians on special subjects of musical interest. For the rest, we have to say that a special Jubilee number will appear on June 1 next, and that proprietors, editor, and contributors are bent upon making it one in every respect worthy of an almost unique occasion.

There only remains for us, on this the first day of 1894, to hope that our readers and friends may find the New Year prosperous and happy. Should they feel the same towards The Musical Times, that alone will be a sufficient augury of continued success.

"MUSICAL TIMES" INTERVIEWS.

No. I.—DR. MACKENZIE ON OPERA.

In conformity with our intention described in another column, we here inaugurate the series of Interviews with eminent musicians, which, it is hoped, will form a special and interesting feature of The Musical Times. Dr. Mackenzie, by his thoughtful and lucidly expressed replies to the questions put, has amply justified our estimate of the "Interview," properly conducted, as an educational force, and the illustrious line destined to succeed the genial Principal of the Royal Academy of Music will, we may rest assured, not lower the standard set by him. It may be stated that the questions were prepared beforehand and read to Dr. Mackenzie after dinner, and that his answers were delivered from a cosy arm-chair, under the soothing influence of tobacco.

"Should an opera consist of a drama with music, or of music with a drama?"

"The form most popular at the present day is, very decidedly, 'drama with music.' Take, for example, 'Cavalleria' and 'Pagliacci'—they owe their success to the interest and power of their quickly moving dramas rather than to their music. I do not for a moment wish to ignore the musical merits of these works—indeed, owing to my long residence in Italy, I may claim to sympathise with Italian music more than most English musicians do—but it is impossible not to see that their strength is dramatic rather than musical. Why, as regards 'Pagliacci,' I was so 'carried away' by the drama (especially in the second act) that had the music been even weaker than it was, I feel sure the effect upon me would have been the same. As a matter of fact, I was not conscious of the music at all, so absorbed was I in the drama. As regards ideal standards, the drama ought, I consider, to be at least equal in importance to the music. We have plenty of examples to prove that a weak drama is fatal. Think of 'Euryanthe'—and it contains perhaps the finest music that Weber ever wrote! No, the best music cannot save an opera which is dramatically weak. The eternal youth of 'Don Giovanni' is due not to the music alone—though that is of exceptional power and beauty—but also to the merit of its drama. Every scene has its point and interest, and the Finales are 'dramatic' in the highest degree. Among modern works, 'Carmen' and 'Faust' are splendid examples of the combination of a good drama with good music—this, of course, quite apart from the question whether the librettists of 'Faust' have dealt adequately with Goethe's conception, which is 'another story.' Operas of which the dramas are a mere peg on which to hang the music are, I am sure, gone never to return."

"In what respects should a drama to be sung differ from one that is to be spoken?"

"To begin with, far greater concentration is needed. A sentiment takes much longer to express in words that are sung than in words that are spoken. The action of an opera will therefore be slower than that of a play. The incidents of the plot, too, must be less complex, and the motives of the characters less analysed, on account of the abstract nature of musical expression. Music lends itself but little to intellectual complications. In 'Colomba,' for instance, if I may permit myself to speak of my own work, there is a fault of this kind. The story turns upon an event which happens before the curtain is raised, and which, consequently, has to be told and re-told by various personages during the progress of the opera. The first act of 'Tristan' and other works of Wagner are open to the same charge. For this reason I have never been able to join the ranks of the advanced Wagnerians."

"What subjects are best suited for opera—mythical, legendary, historical, or domestic?"

"Historical subjects are to be avoided—too many events and consequences have to be crowded into the plot. Mythical ones do not appeal to me. Myths are, I know, held to present us with human interests in a typical form; but in a drama the characters interest us as persons, not as types. Who, for instance, cares to realise that the 'Flying Dutchman' represents the yearning of mankind for release from the storms of life; or that Senta typifies the 'Ewig-Weibliche'? Let us, by all means, have legendary subjects—the legends of the world supply innumerable subjects of the most inspiring kind for a composer of imagination. Domestic subjects, too, are suitable, if treated properly. Common (or shall I say uncommon?) sense should indicate to a composer what proper treatment is. I noted, not long ago, a supremely ridiculous example of maladroitness in this respect—'Le Rêve'—in which we had advanced Wagnerism (turned sour) in the orchestra, and pot-hats and tweed trousers on the stage."

"Does difference of subject-matter in libretti necessitate difference of general treatment on the part of the composer?"

"As I have just said, subject-matter ought to influence the general treatment of the music. In addition to characteristic expression, which will, of course, vary with the subject, appropriateness of style must also be considered—in melody, harmony, and orchestration. As regards 'form,' however, it seems clear that what is sauce for the tragic goose will be sauce for the comic gander. In form, there is little difference between 'Otello' and 'Falstaff,' or between 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger.'"

"What number of acts do you think best for an opera? Are you in favour of 'one-acters?'"

"Three acts—not more. Five acts are altogether a mistake—in spite of tradition. Who, now-a-days, knows anything of the last act of the 'Huguenots'? Four acts, of course, are better, but they do not group well. The thickest part of a plot should be in the middle, and it is very difficult to spread this central interest over two acts, to say nothing of the fact that unless the third be more effective than the second it will have all the effect of an anti-climax. It is interesting to note the gradual shortening of operas, though in this they do but follow the general tendency of the day, which favours brevity in all things—artistic as well as literary. I have said that I regard three acts as the ideal form; but operas in one act are by no means to be sneered at. They are being overdone at present, of course; but what of that? There is room for operas in one act—good ones."

"Should the music of an opera be continuous (as, for instance, in Wagner) or divided into separate numbers?"

"Continuous, most decidedly. The division into separate numbers is no longer acceptable to musical thinkers. I do not, of course, wish you to understand by this that an act of an opera should be one long unresolved suspension, or that lyrical moments and soliloquies should not find their full expression in a final cadence; but only that the conventional 'numbers'—aria, cavatina, &c.—are decidedly of the past. Composers who belong to that past, however, are not to be condemned for adopting the formulæ of their time, however obsolete these may appear to us."

"Which should predominate — voices or orchestra?"

"Personally, I do not think the musical interest of an opera should be confined to the orchestra. I may be voted old-fashioned; but I regard 'Faust' and 'Carmen' as very happy specimens of the operatic form in this respect. Now-a-days, the orchestral tide threatens to rise high enough to extinguish the footlights. At any rate, we have gone quite far enough: I should like to see a little more courtesy extended to the voice."

"How would you define the terms 'Dramatic' and 'Lyric' as applied to music?"

"It is difficult—so much confusion exists, even in the poetical sense of the words, to which one must always refer. In connection with music, these two words (and others) are very loosely used, even by good writers. We say, for instance, 'the lyric stage,' meaning the opera. Yet purely 'lyric' composers, as we call them, are just those who are said to fail in opera—Schumann, for instance. Again, operas have been divided into tragic (opera seria), lyric, romantic, and comic, which indicates a further confusion. For if lyric and dramatic are two different things—as they certainly are in poetry—a lyric opera ought to mean an opera—therefore a drama with music—that is not dramatic, or one in which songs or melodies preponderate over action. And surely this amounts, practically, to a condemnation. Taking the famous definition of claret as a wine that "would be port if it could," we might describe lyric opera as 'opera that would be dramatic if it could.' As applied to music, 'lyric' might, perhaps, be defined as passive and 'dramatic' as active. But this is a knot I do not feel myself competent to untie."

"Do you approve the use of 'local colour' in opera?"

"Yes; if used with discretion I decidedly like it. But only a few composers seem able to adapt themselves successfully to other nationalities than their own. It is difficult, of course. One of the most striking and persistent attempts at local colour is to be found in an opera which is scarcely known—'Uthal,' by the French composer, Méhul, who was a much greater man than people generally suspect. The subject of 'Utal' is Ossianic, and the use of violas and harps, without violins, to produce dark Northern effects of colour, with which we are familiar in Mendelssohn and Gade, was clearly invented by Méhul."

"Do you consider the recent developments of opera (as exemplified, for instance, in Wagner) to be a legitimate continuation of the reforms of Gluck?"

"Yes, decidedly a continuation of Gluck; and, to my taste, fortunately also a modernisation of Gluck. For I must confess that his operas, in spite of the number of sublimities they undoubtedly contain, weary me. I miss the variety of tone-colour to which modern music has accustomed me."

"Which, in your opinion, is the greatest opera hitherto written?"

"I have an admiration for too many different styles to answer that question. I can hear the 'Magic Flute' or 'Carmen,' 'Faust' or 'Die Meistersinger,' each with the greatest delight. As a boy-violinist in the orchestra, I played in so many operas before the year 1862—including 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and 'Faust,' none of which had then been heard in England—that the répertoire is very familiar to me, and I have too many 'favourites' to be able to pick out one."

"As to spoken dialogue in opera—do you approve it? And do you like it when accompanied by the orchestra?"

"I am bound to say that, owing to the conventionalities of the operatic genre I am little offended by inconsistencies of this sort. An opera can never be realistic. But I cannot say I like spoken dialogue, with an orchestral accompaniment, in an opera. In a play it is sometimes very effective, and may be made so on the concert platform. Spoken dialogue (without accompaniment), as, for instance, in opéra comique, I do not object to in the least.

"What special gifts are required in a composer of opera?"

"Opera has a fascination for most composers, but it requires special training—the form differs so largely from that of other branches of composition. I do not think that failures are always attributable to a composer's want of 'dramatic instinct' (as the phrase goes), but rather to his inability to express himself in the operatic idiom. Composers who have 'musical form' at their fingers' ends, so to speak, are generally the least successful in opera, because their training—I had almost said their symphonic training—induces them to follow out the development of their thematic material logically to the bitter end. Their habit of thinking in the symmetrical forms of instrumental music appears to destroy their power of breaking off a subject at the proper moment. Of course any bungler can produce a 'patchwork'—the art of being incoherent is easily acquired—but I now refer to the power of following with sufficient rapidity the varying sentiments of a dramatic scene; this seems to be denied to many otherwise highly gifted composers. Is it not significant that, with few exceptions, the successful opera writers are just those who are not symphonists? I always regret that the efforts of native composers in opera meet with so little encouragement, as I love the stage, and may even confess that I have not yet given up hopes of writing for it. There is a great lack of trained librettists, however, and most of the failures (as, I suppose, we must call them) are due as much to this cause as to any other. Our librettists are, many of them, able to write excellent lines and lyrics; but, unfortunately, they are not good playwrights. If some of our masters of stagecraft (no! it is invidious to mention names) would condescend to write operas, or, better still, to collaborate—in French fashion—with a versifier, we might get on better. But, in addition to this, there is a general lack of enterprise and interest all round. Native operatic composers have few favourable chances from any point of view. Let us hope there is a good time coming!"

BEETHOVEN'S SKETCH BOOKS.

By J. S. Shedlock, B.A.

SECOND SERIES.

No. II.—BACH.—HANDEL.—MOZART.

Bach.

When Beethoven was quite young he could play by heart the preludes and fugues of the "Wohltemperirtes Clavier," and the frequent allusions to Sebastian Bach in the Sketch Books show in what estimation the old was held by the modern master. In one place we meet with over twenty bars of the Chromatic Fantasia, commencing from—and over twenty bars of the Fugue, which follows, copied out. And the Fugue is carefully marked

"Sebastian Bach."

In a Sketch Book belonging to A. Artaria there are two passages from the "Art of Fugue" and also two passages from the great five-part Fugue in B flat minor ("Wohl. Cl.," Part I., No. 22). That Fugue, indeed, must specially have attracted Beethoven's attention, for in the Royal Library, Berlin, there is a score of it, for Violini, Viola, and Celli in the master's handwriting, and marked "Fuga von Sebastian Bach." A word or two with regard to this relic may prove of interest to students.

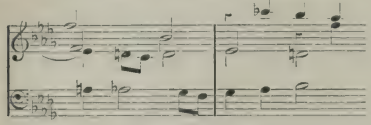
There is one passage (bars 50 and 51) which reads thus, in the Bach-Gesellschaft edition:—



Now a note in the Appendix tells us that neither in the text of the Bach-Gesellschaft (which follows the famous Wagener Autograph) nor in that of any other edition is the five-part writing, with its stretto effects, clearly indicated; and for anyone who might wish to make a score, the editor, Franz Kroll, by a slight alteration, suggests a choice of ways of making each part clear. They are as follows—

Now in the score made by Beethoven not one of these three readings is adopted. The composer had in his possession a copy (Nägeli edition) of the "Wohltemperirtes Clavier," but he did not even follow this. The Nägeli bars are as follows—

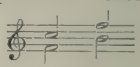
Beethoven's score reads thus—and, as compared with the other readings, is by no means satisfactory.

A few bars later we find Beethoven scratching out some notes; he had evidently mistaken the second soprano for first, and the tenor for second soprano. From this it would seem as if he had not previously studied the music with a view to writing it out in open score. His version of the famous stretto commencing in bar 67 is singularly corrupt. In bar 70, for instance, the bass has a rest in place of the minim F, the most telling note of the passage.

In bar 21 Beethoven writes consecutive fifths between first soprano and tenor—



So far as we are aware, they do not exist in any autograph, manuscript, or printed copy. In the Nägeli edition* (which he most probably used) the parts run, in the usual manner, as follows—

Were these consecutive fifths an oversight? Or may we venture to suppose that they were a joke? On the third page of the sheet on which Beethoven has written out this B flat minor Fugue there is a sketch of Bagatelle, No. 7 (Op. 33)— and, on the last page, one of the Coda of No. 5 in C. These Bagatelles were written about 1800, so probably that is near the date of the Fugue score.

These references to Bach are most interesting, and others could be quoted from Nottebohm. Beethoven's admiration for the master was extreme, and as readers of the "Zweite Beethoveniana" know, he made repeated attempts at a Bach Overture. In one book he has the following note:—

"Overture auf Bach sehr fugirt mit 3
(Posaunen? Subjecten?)"

Handel.

Beethoven's veneration for Bach's great contemporary is well known. "The Messiah" being once the subject of conversation, Beethoven said of Handel: "I would uncover my head and kneel at his grave." And on his deathbed, pointing to the volumes of Handel's works which had been presented to him, he exclaimed: "There is the truth."

Among the Sketch Books there are some interesting allusions to Handel. In the Berlin Library there is a portion of the Overture to

* There is a Nägeli copy of the Wohl. Clavier in the Berlin Library which was used by the composer. It may be interesting—though this will scarcely occasion surprise—to know that it is well worn. Moreover, it is imperfect: it contains only the first part, and, even of this, only down to the 24th bar of the B major Fugue. It is bound up with Suites, Inventions, &c.

"Solomon" written out in open score by Beethoven. Again, in one place we find the opening bars of the following numbers from "The Messiah": "And the glory," "But who may abide," "O Thou that tellest," "The people that walked," "The Pastoral Symphony," and "Behold the Lamb of God," with certain score-indications referring to Mozart's so-called additional accompaniments. In "The people that walked" he has written the first four bars, and underneath the last has written Mozart's entry of clarinets (in A)—

Then follow "Thy rebuke," "Behold and see," "He was cut off," written out in full (1 V., 2 V., Va., Bassi), with German text.

Next, three bars of the score of "Thou shalt break them," also the commencement of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," the violins being marked "con sordini," and a few bars Clarino solo in D, of Mozart's version of "The trumpet shall sound." (It may be mentioned that in a Sketch Book in the British Museum there are also some attempts at scoring "I know that my Redeemer liveth.") These are immediately followed by—and some sketches for the first and last movements of the Violin Concerto in D. This juxtaposition of "The Messiah" and the C minor Symphony is a musical phenomenon well worthy of note.

There is an allusion to both Handel and Mozart in a Sketch Book in the Library of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna. On a sheet containing a sketch of the opening of the Pianoforte Sonata in C minor (Op. 111) there is the following curious entry—the first being the theme of the Kyrie fugue in Mozart's Requiem, the second the theme of "And with Thy stripes" from "The Messiah." Why did not Beethoven complete the triumvirate, and quote—from the Finale of Haydn's Quartet in F minor (Op. 20, No. 5)?

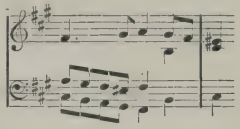
Another interesting fact with regard to Handel. Professor Fischhoff, whose name in connection with Beethoven autographs is well known, came into possession of a volume (old English edition) of Handel's "Lessons for the Harpsichord," which had belonged to Beethoven in his student days. (We find, for instance, in the Fugue of the E minor Suite the various entries of the theme marked.) That volume is now in the Berlin Library. In the Fugue of the F sharp minor Suite, bars 13, 14 are as follows—



The consecutive octaves attracted the student's attention. He ran his pencil through the B of the middle voice, and wrote in the margin also in pencil—

"könnte D seyn weil es das Subjectum ist"
(might be D, as it is the subject).

The middle voice, in fact, has the subject, and D is the right note belonging to it.

Nineteen bars later came the following passage—

Beethoven felt there was something wrong with the harmonic progression, put a mark (×) against the second D in the lowest voice, and wrote in the margin—

"vielleicht H"
(perhaps B).

This was a good suggestion, but the German Handel Society edition shows that the A was the note needing correction, thus—

MOZART.

In a book containing sketches of the C minor and Pastoral Symphonies we find the composer has copied out thirty bars of the development section of the Finale of Mozart's Symphony in G minor (at least of the string parts) from—

For the first note of bar 6 (p. 42, B. and H. score) Beethoven has written G or A in place of Mozart's B flat. Was it a slip or intentional? This G minor extract is actually on a sheet containing—the transition passage to the Finale of the C minor Symphony. Nottebohm, in his "Zweite Beethoveniana," mentions the curious fact that in tone-succession (though not in rhythm or key) the first nine notes of the Finale of the Mozart Symphony are the same as the first nine of the Scherzo of the C minor Symphony. For the sake of comparison we quote the two openings. The principal theme of the Pianoforte Sonata in F minor (Op. 2, No. 1)— seems also to have been suggested by Mozart. But in our first series on the Beethoven Sketch Books (June, 1892, p. 333) we gave, as the prototype of the F minor Sonata theme, one from an early Pianoforte Quartet by Beethoven, written three years before Mozart's Symphony was produced, and transposing the Beethoven into G minor, the key of the Mozart—

"Did Beethoven notice the resemblance?" asks Nottebohm.

GEORGE ALEXANDER OSBORNE.

In our last issue we noticed briefly the death of Mr. George Osborne. To the present generation he was little more than a name, but we cannot help thinking that some further facts and anecdotes connected with the career of so remarkable a link with the past should be recalled to the minds of our readers. To most musicians of to-day he is best known as the author of a favourite showpiece for the pianoforte, which, when middle-aged musicians were young, enjoyed a vogue comparable to that of the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana." As a matter of fact, the late Mr. Osborne was not only a meritorious composer of chamber music, but he was the intimate personal friend of two of the most remarkable musicians of the century, Chopin and Berlioz; the latter of whom, a fine critic as well as a composer, spoke of Osborne's works in the following eulogistic terms: "You have published trios and various pieces for pianoforte solo, grand in construction and elevated in style; and even without searching through your more ambitious repertory, your songs, such as 'The beating of my own heart,' 'My lonely home,' or 'Such things were,' which your sister, Mrs. Hampton, sings so poetically, are fascinating things. Nothing excites my imagination more vividly and makes it fly more rapidly to the green hills of Ireland than those quaint virginal melodies, which seem wafted by the evening breeze over the gently rippling waves of Killarney; or those hymns of resigned love, to which one listens with inexplicable emotion, dreaming of solitude, of nature in her grand moods, of loved ones who are no more, of the heroes of ancient times, of one's suffering country, even of death itself." (Letter to Mr. Osborne, from Darmstadt, in 1843. Berlioz's "Memoirs," chap. lxi.)

George Alexander Osborne was born in 1806, at Limerick, where his father was an organist, and his pleasant Irish brogue remained with him to the last. He was more or less self-taught until the age of eighteen, when, owing to the severe illness of an aunt then residing in Brussels, he was sent thither by his father, who could not then undertake the journey, and having decided to embrace music as his profession, set to work with a will to complete his education. He found a patron in the Prince de Chimay, and, after some wearisome years of study and anxiety, was appointed as instructor to the eldest son of the Prince of Orange, afterwards King of Holland. After a while he was entrusted with the direction of the Concerts of the Prince of Orange, and in one of the charming autobiographical papers read by him before the Musical Association in April, 1883, he relates how, while residing at the Château de Chimay, he made the acquaintance of Malibran, and often accompanied her on horseback on her cross-country rides. Here, too, on one memorable occasion, Cherubini, while a guest at the Château, was actually induced to take the part of Count Armand in a performance of "Les Deux Journées." The results, however, were disastrous, for "at the performance the Prince, who played the part of the Water-Carrier, had just come on the stage in the second act with the cart in which was Cherubini, when the latter was seized with colic. In vain he tried to gain the Prince's attention, but the latter being too much absorbed in his part, did not hear the moaning, and, as the pains increased, a voice from the cart was heard by all in the theatre shouting out in a strong Italian accent, 'Drag me away from here,' which was promptly done, the audience being convulsed with laughter." We are not surprised to hear that this was the last time Cherubini appeared in an operatic performance. Of Cherubini's house in Paris Mr. Osborne gives a curious description: "His salon was a study in itself. On the walls were groups of fantastic figures made by the great Maëstro out of playing cards cut up, and their colours blended so as to represent the most comical combinations. Many hours of the day were thus spent by him—in fact, it was a mania which gave him great pleasure."

While in Paris, where Osborne enjoyed a considerable reputation as a pianist, he was intimate with Auber, De Beriot, Berlioz, and, in fact, all the leading musicians of the time. As regards Chopin, it is an interesting fact that on the occasion of the famous Polish musician's début in Paris in 1831, at a Concert in Pleyel's Rooms, Osborne was one of the four pianists who played the arrangement of the orchestral accompaniment to one of Chopin's Concertos, with the composer as soloist. Amongst other celebrities with whom Osborne was on terms of intimacy was Henriette Smithson—a compatriot of his, for she came from Ennis, in Clare—the famous actress whom Berlioz afterwards married. Osborne witnessed her first appearance as Ophelia in Paris, and declares that "never before or since was a greater success achieved on the French stage. I remember," he adds, "being at a public ball, and while walking with her leaning on my arm, we were stopped by Mdlle. George, the great French tragédienne, who took my other arm, making me look like an urn with two handles as we paced up and down the room. Many were the winks and nods I received, one gentleman loudly remarking, 'Look at that monopoliser of tragedy!'" Apropos of Berlioz, it is worthy of notice that it was with Osborne that he visited St. Paul's at the Service of Charity Children. They both put on surplices and sang out of the same book, and Berlioz, who was affected to tears, declared that never during the whole course of his life had music affected him in the same way as the singing in unison of those children. Another curious fact which Mr. Osborne has placed upon record about Berlioz is that "it was his constant habit to go into orchestras and sit with the different performers, watching them and turning over the pages for them." Of Malibran he used to tell one irresistible anecdote: "Being requested to sing in London for a charity, she consented, and chose the third act of Vaccai's 'Romeo and Juliet,' on condition she had for Juliet a young sister of mine, a beautiful girl with a fine soprano voice, cultivated by Bordogni. As Malibran undertook to coach my sister in the part, I gave my consent, and it was arranged that I should conduct the opera, so as to lend confidence to my sister, as she was an amateur. After sundry rehearsals the performance took place, and all went well until after praying at the tomb of Juliet, Malibran rushed forward to sing her scena, but instead of doing so, suddenly returned to the tomb to pray a little more. Great was the applause in the theatre which greeted this tragic display, and more so when she sang her scena. I was lost in astonishment, and after the performance asked for an explanation, which she gave me as nearly as possible in the following words: 'My dear George, I fully intended starting off with my scena on approaching the orchestra, but, whether from anxiety about your sister or myself I know not, your countenance had a more than usual expression of sheepishness, which imperatively obliged me to return to the tomb, not to pray, but to suppress my laughter!'"

Mr. Osborne returned to London in 1843, and spent the last fifty years of his long life in our midst, endearing himself to all whom he came across by his goodness of heart and his unfailing courtesy of manner. For many years he was in great request as a teacher and performer. There is one amusing anecdote illustrative of the embarrassing popularity of his famous "Pluie des Perles," which he used to tell against himself. At a fashionable afternoon party, to which he came very late, he was invited to play, and accordingly sat down at the pianoforte, and began upon the piece in question. To his surprise and indignation the whole audience burst out laughing; but he was easily appeased on learning that four other pianists had already performed the same composition. To the end of his life he retained his keen interest in music, was a constant attendant at the meetings of the Musical Association, where his share in the discussions which followed the papers was generally enlivened by humorous remarks or anecdotes. His last performance in public was only a couple of years ago at one of the Wind Instrument Society's Concerts, when he played the pianoforte part in his Sextet with remarkable skill and spirit. Later still his venerable figure might often be seen at afternoon concerts in St. James's Hall. It is much to be regretted that he never wrote his memoirs at length. But his reticence was in all probability the result of his ineradicable goodness of heart.

The "Interview," as a means of supplying "tittle-tattle" and of pandering to impertinent curiosity, is a painfully familiar feature of modern life as exhibited by "The New Journalism." But the Interview as a means of instruction has most unaccountably been neglected. Yet a moment's consideration will show that it teems with possibilities of a kind that from an educational point of view can scarcely be over-rated. It is our intention, in the series which is inaugurated in our present number, to elicit the opinion of the most eminent musicians on all subjects of vital interest to lovers of the "Art Divine." That this departure will be cordially appreciated by the readers of The Musical Times may be taken for granted; and we ask them also to join us in thanking, d'avance, those whose generous courtesy makes possible the accomplishment of a design hitherto unique in the history of musical journalism, and the results of which, it is reasonable to hope, will be permanent and far-reaching.

Music is generally admitted to be the purest and most refined of the arts because it is the most abstract and least material: it has, therefore, been considered —though not by all—to exercise a refining influence. Unfortunately association with what is noble does not always cause an elevation of soul, as may be seen in the often quoted case of those who devote themselves to companionship with that noblest of the lower animals, the horse. The most ardent votaries of music, professional singers and players, should all, if there were anything in the "refining influence" theory, be conspicuous for mental and physical refinement; but can anyone assert this to be the case? We will only cast a passing thought on the fact that music has, during the present century, developed an entirely new characteristic—vulgarity, to wit—at the demand of the vulgar class of humanity, and that in every civilised country the more vulgar music can become the larger is the number of its admirers. Further, music is pressed into the service of those who would consider themselves refined, just at times when they are most exposing themselves as shams. For instance, look at the way it is employed as a mere cover for conversation at parties and at theatres! Next—but here we fancy we hear ourselves challenged to define what we mean by vulgarity in music and to explain how an abstract and refined art can be open to perversion. Vulgarity in music then, as in everything else, is not an inherent quality, but a matter of association. Blue or mauve ostrich feathers once adorned the head-dresses of the fashionable fair, but they have so long been the special ornament of East-end work-girls that for a lady to wear one would be to send a shudder through the whole of society. Wax flowers under a glass case, tripe and onions, the scent of patchouli, a rockery in one's front garden—all these are harmless and perhaps estimable things in their way, but by their associations hopelessly vulgar. So in music certain phrases, cadences, and particularly harmonic progressions—the see-sawing of a bass between tonic and dominant, for instance—however charming they may once have been, have sunk through the various stages of commonplaceness, conventionality, and staleness until they are abandoned to that curious class of people who use threadbare material with evident enjoyment of its very triteness. The composers of Italian opera at the beginning of this century all laid themselves open to the charge of vulgarity in the way they revelled in a few cheap and easy effects, such as the melodies in thirds of Bellini, the Finales of Donizetti, and the crescendos of Rossini. But for the modern composer to use any of their worn-out devices is to proclaim himself a rank vulgarian. And now please to observe how the end of this digression brings us close back to our opening statement. The votaries of music we spoke of—singers, bandsmen, and so on—might perhaps find their characters elevated could they but live in an atmosphere of good music, but think of the floods of conventional and vulgar music in which for the most part they welter! Just so might we all be more estimable moral characters could we hear no sermons but good ones on Sundays. We will not say that poor humanity is more easily influenced by what is bad than by what is good, because that is pessimistic; but at least we must acknowledge that since every day adds to the stock of what is worn out and vulgar in music, the "refining influence" has a hard task to make itself felt and an ever-increasing current to battle against.

Admirers of Berlioz should not fail to read the interesting biographical notes and personal reminiscences of that illustrious master contributed to the Christmas number of the Century Magazine, by M. Ernest Reyer, the distinguished composer of "Sigurd" and "Salammbô," who succeeded Berlioz as musical critic to the Débats. Apropos of musical criticism, M. Reyer prefaces his reminiscences with a cheerful specimen of Scudo's style: "The Chinese, who amuse their leisure moments by the sound of the tom-tom; the savage, who is roused into fury by the rubbing together of two stones, make music of the kind composed by M. Hector Berlioz." M. Reyer's appreciation for the genius of Berlioz dates from the year 1854, when he was present at the first performance of "L'Enfance du Christ," and from that day till the hour of Berlioz's death, which he actually witnessed, he remained his devoted admirer. He gives a curious account of the musical evenings at Berlioz's house, where young Théodore Ritter used to play from the scores of "Roméo et Juliette" and the "Damnation de Faust," while Berlioz would sit and weep at his own music, and then, as he accompanied Reyer back to his house, would "give himself up to the exuberance of his spirits" and indulge in the most outrageous jokes and puns. With regard to the first part of the "Troyens"—"The Fall of Troy"—we learn that Berlioz only heard one fragment of it—namely, the duet between Cassandra and Corœbus—which was sung by Madame Viardot and M. Lefort, at a Concert at Baden under the composer's direction. "The Fall of Troy" has been given on the concert platform in Paris, but never on the stage. Of Herr Mottl's production of the "Troyens" in its integrity, at Carlsruhe, M. Reyer remarks: "Unfortunately it will doubtless produce a greater stir in Germany than with us of France." Berlioz, it may be added, left M. Reyer an annotated edition of "Paul and Virginia," one of his annotations being "To sum up, a book sublime, heartrending, delicious, but which would make a man an atheist if he were not one already." On this M. Reyer comments: "I have never believed in the atheism of the man who wrote the poem and music of 'L'Enfance du Christ,' who sang such pure melodies to the Virgin Mary and to the angels guarding the sleep of the child Jesus. A freethinker—like his father, Dr. Berlioz—he was, perhaps; but nothing more." M. Reyer was one of those who journeyed down the other day to the Côte Saint-André to attend the inauguration of the Berlioz statue in the town where he was born, and we cordially endorse his remark that the inscription on the memorial tablet outside the house in which he saw the light—"To Hector Berlioz, from his fellow-citizens, happy in his glory, and proud of his genius"—ought to have been placed there twenty years ago. But twenty years ago it would not have been true.

In one of her essays, George Eliot speaks of a man who "makes himself haggard at night in writing out his dissent from what nobody ever believed." Writers on music seem to take a special pleasure in this form of exercise. One, for instance, will write a pugnacious essay to prove that music without melody is an abomination. Every living soul who cares for music, already holds the same opinion; but that is of no consequence. He writes his essay all the same, and its readers imagine that someone, somewhere, must have written in favour of music without melody. Of course, it never dawns on the author that another may find "melody" where he hears only disconnected sounds; or that, even where the perceptive powers are equal, it is possible for two minds to have widely different ideas of the conditions essential to a good melody. Another popular subject with the "two-and-two-are-not-five" school of writers is that of the "descriptive" or "representative" powers of music. Here they have a still larger field in which to play the exhilarating game known as "kicking at an open door"; and it is astonishing to reflect how many intellectual athletes—from Hood downwards—have wasted energy in playing it. The latest is a writer in Macmillan, whose initials, "W. H. T.," are appended to an article on "Descriptive Music," in which considerable acumen, much care, culture, and thought have been expended in proving that music, without words, though it can depict the feelings called up by a particular landscape, cannot convey a picture of the landscape itself to the mind of a listener. But who, in the name of all the Grecian gods, ever asserted that it could? Already musicians are divided on the subject of music as a representative art, some holding that it can depict a variety of emotional or mental states of more or less distinctness, and others denying its representative powers altogether. But surely no one, competent to speak on the subject at all, ever suggested that music, without the aid of words, could depict things, as well as mental states—mountains, for instance, as well as moods. To write, as "W. H. T." does, as though the "aims and methods of modern musicians" were the representation, by music, of "scenes," is to further bewilder the mind of the amateur, already sufficiently puzzled by the conflicting arguments of doctors who disagree; and may even induce the simple to suppose that a school of musical thinkers exists who assert that music can draw pictures of "beautiful landscapes and noble buildings" (to quote "W. H. T."), and that therefore such a view may be tenable. A possibility which is anything but comforting.

A correspondent of the Leipzig Signale gives some interesting details about the late Peter Tschaikowsky's last appearance in public, on October 16. The occasion was the first Symphony Concert of the St. Petersburg Imperial Musical Society, which the deceased master conducted. The programme consisted of the Overture to an unfinished opera, "Carmosine," by Laroche, a Larghetto and Gavotte from Mozart's "Idomeneo," Tschaikowsky's first Pianoforte Concerto, and his anxiously awaited new Symphony (No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74). The new Symphony consists of a sombre introduction leading into an Allegro con grazia in 3-4 time. This is followed by a Scherzo, allegro vivace, containing some clever combinations of themes and brilliantly orchestrated. The last movement is not an Allegro, but a remarkable Adagio Lamentoso of a very solemn, not to say tragic character. Although the composer was recalled many times at the finish, he was not satisfied with the effect which his new work had produced, and he expressed a hope that it might soon be performed again to enable its being better understood. To this end he also gave it, after the performance, the title of "Symphonie Pathétique," little thinking how soon his wish would be gratified, and the new title become, indeed, strangely appropriate. A few days afterwards the master was dead, and on October 28 his funeral took place. Thousands of his admirers followed the hearse, and the streets were crowded with tens of thousands more who watched the long and solemn procession as it wended its way to the Kassan Cathedral, and thence to the Newsky Monastery, where the remains were interred. The new Symphony was repeated at the second Concert of the Musical Society. In the middle of the orchestra stood a bust of the composer, surrounded by laurels and palms and crowned with a laurel wreath. Court-Conductor Napravnik occupied the place where only three weeks before Tschaikowsky had stood in perfect health conducting his last work. The crowded audience seemed at first depressed, but the beauty and power of the music soon drew forth enthusiastic applause. The performers were deeply moved, and surpassed themselves in their superb renderings of the various works. Besides the Symphony, the programme included the master's Overture to "Romeo and Juliet," his Violin Concerto, played by Leopold Auer; pianoforte solos by Fräulein aus der Ohe, and an air from the opera "Eugeny Onegin," splendidly sung by the artist who created the part of the hero in this work when it was given in London—viz., Mr. Eugène Oudin. Altogether this "In Memoriam" Concert was worthy of the greatest Russian composer and of the foremost musical society in the Russian capital.

In view of the craze for cheap distinctions from which the musical profession is now suffering, a case decided before the Court of Session in Edinburgh not long ago has a peculiar interest. It seems that the members of three societies of accountants in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, incorporated by royal charter in 1854, 1855, and 1867 respectively, adopted the designation "Chartered Accountants," and used the abbreviation "C.A." after their names. In 1891 a company calling itself "The Corporation of Accountants, Limited," was registered in Scotland under the Companies' Acts. By its Articles of Association the members of this company were to be styled "Corporate Accountants," and they made public professional use of the letters "C.A." An action having been brought by the three chartered bodies against the new company for an "interdict" (the Scotch equivalent of "injunction"), it was proved that the letters "C.A." were generally recognised in Scotland as the designation of members of the Chartered Societies, and that prior to 1891 they had practically been used by no other persons. Under these circumstances both the Lord Ordinary and the Appellate Court held that the members of the old societies were entitled to an interdict to prevent the use by members of the new company of the letters "C.A.," or of any other letters or words calculated to mislead the public. From the report of the case, which will be found in Vol. 20 of the "Court of Session Cases," at p. 750, it is evident that the judges formed a pretty strong opinion of the motive which underlay the assumption of the title "Corporate Accountants" by the Limited Company. The Lord Justice-Clerk, in his judgment, made this very pertinent observation: "I must say, that the members of this company seem to be willing, to say the least, to accept all the benefit of being supposed to be members of one of the chartered bodies."

The current year-book of the Royal Society of Musicians contains two interesting references to the extempore performances of Liszt and Mendelssohn. In 1824 Liszt, then twelve years old, visited England for the first time. He was present at the annual dinner of the Society, where, according to the Quarterly Musical Magazine, "he extemporised for about twenty minutes before that judgmatical audience of professors and their friends." Five years later Mendelssohn, then twenty, was also a guest at the same festive board, when, says the Spectator, he "most kindly gave his assistance in an extempore fantasia on the pianoforte, in which he introduced, successively, subjects from the Sinfonias of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven; treating them with the skill and science of an accomplished musician." The list of musicians whose names are thus pleasantly associated with the Society could be extended. Haydn specially composed a March for wind instruments, to be performed at an annual festival, the MS. of which is still in the Society's possession. Weber, in 1826, rendered a similar service, though his fatal illness prevented his presence at the dinner. And it must not be forgotten that "George Frederick Handel (a member)" bequeathed to the Society "one thousand pounds," a sum which represents a good many notes of a certain kind.

We hear from New York that Mr. Frank Damrosch, whose energy seems to know no limit, has added to his multifarious duties a task of fine conception and admirable execution. We refer to his Musical Art Society, which is composed only of professionals of high rank and broad musical culture, who will engage in the study of the works of Palestrina, Bach, Cornelius, Brahms, and other masters, many of whose compositions are too difficult for ordinary amateurs to attempt. Nothing but the best will be studied, and nothing will be performed in public until it satisfies the critical judgment of Mr. Damrosch and certain collaborators whose knowledge and skill are unquestionable. The expenses, which are necessarily very great, are to be met by a guarantee fund, which is practically assured, and the resident artists have entered into Mr. Damrosch's plans with an enthusiasm and a zest which justify him in announcing two Concerts for the present season. An additional feature of interest will be the study and performance of old English part-songs and glees. The educational value of a Society with such high ideals, under a Conductor of the recognised skill of Mr. Damrosch, and with ample means, is manifest, and adds one more factor to the debt of gratitude which New York owes to this gentleman for his indefatigable efforts in the promotion of pure, sound music.

A quotation from Mr. Sala's "Echoes of the Week," published July 4 last, is certainly late, but "better late than never": "But a more curious story touching the 'March from Scipio' in connection with the noble verses on the 'Loss of the Royal George' comes to me from a friendly correspondent at Beverley. Cowper, it appears, was in the court-yard of a friend's house, walking to and fro in one of his peculiar moods, when a gentleman rushed up exclaiming, 'Mr. Cowper, the Royal George has gone down, with the admiral and 800 men.' Cowper, to all seeming, took no notice of his visitor, but continued his walk, whistling all the while the March from 'Scipio.' When the visitor had left, the poet stepped into a doorway and scribbled down his ever-to-be-remembered verses; and it was found, when the poem was published, that it could be sung to the March which he was whistling when he heard of the disaster." Is anything known of this story, apart from Mr. Sala's Beverley correspondent? Hayley, in his "Life of Cowper," speaks of the poem as "adapted to the March in Scipio," but gives none of the details supplied to "Echoes of the Week."

Truly, a "Royal Prussian Court Conductor's" lot is—like that of Mr. Gilbert's policeman—not a happy one. Some time since, Herr Felix Weingartner, of the Berlin Opera, was called upon at very short notice to conduct a performance of the "Cavalleria" in place of his colleague, Dr. Muck. In consequence of his adopting somewhat different tempi to those the executants were used to, the performance was not all that could be desired. Thereupon the unfortunate Conductor was fined 120 marks "for careless conducting, due to his dislike of Mascagni"! More recently the same gentleman was mulcted in 300 marks because he had dared to write to a Munich paper to defend himself against certain accusations which his chief had brought against him in an official communication addressed to the very same paper! No wonder Herr Weingartner will leave Berlin for Munich as soon as his contract is finished. Berlin's loss will be Munich's gain.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Ever since this department of The Musical Times was established it has remained, by grace of an esteemed and trusting Editor, under my care. But the fact has not been avowed, save, indeed, on one occasion, when a Californian "came down like a wolf on the fold," and attacked the chief for words uttered by a subordinate. That was my fight, and, proclaiming my responsibility, I went into it. The chance of some such event occurring in the future is not, however, the reason why (again with Editorial approbation) I propose to write henceforth over my own signature. It is clear that the anonymous in English journalism—especially in the artistic branch thereof—yields more and more to the modern demand for an avowed personality. The public desire to know who it is that assumes to teach them; the profession would prefer not to be ignorant of the critic who, in any particular case, takes them to task. I see no reason why either the public or the profession should be denied. But there is another advantage. Writing in the first person singular, with the freedom attaching to a purely individual utterance, the conditions are more elastic, the scope of expression is larger, and, with due tact and care, it is not difficult to establish a valuable rapport between author and readers.

I have only to express a hope that the correspondents who, in the past, have contributed to the interest of "Facts, Rumours, and Remarks" will be my helpers in the future, sending their valued communications, addressed to myself at the office of this journal.

G. H. C. writes me from Hyde as under:—"Apropos of Gounod's 'Funeral March of a Marionette,' which I find is mentioned twice in your current issue with reference to the late composer, I would like to draw your attention to the great similarity between the subject of this composition and a phrase in the 'Rondo' of Mozart's Sixteenth Sonata for pianoforte and violin—

From Rondo to Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte, No. 16.

Mozart.

Doubtless many of your readers will have come across the latter passage and noticed the coincidence; but although you devoted a considerable space in your columns some time ago to this subject, I do not remember seeing the passages in question then mentioned. It is well known that Gounod confessed to the highest esteem for Mozart, so perhaps the March was designedly built up on the older master's subject. I should be glad if any of your readers can throw any light on the matter." G. H. C. is thanked for his communication. For myself, I am disposed to think that the resemblance pointed out is accidental.

I HAVE received the following "Plea for the Violin," with a request for its insertion. On consideration, it seems to me that the "Plea" should not be withheld from the public:

There are who call the violin a squeaky thing,
And say it causes agony to those who hear;
I grant this is so, when a novice hand
Draws timid bow across the vibrant string
As if afraid to bring out the bold sound and clear
That would come if persuaded properly,
And get instead, noise harsh and horrible
Most like a train emerging from a tunnel;
I wonder if my reader knows the sound I mean?
'Tis not a soothing "piff-paff" but a grinding "oozh,"
Which sets all teeth on edge and quite distracts
All lovers of true music—not the player least.
But what's the case
When o'er the strings there glides a master hand
With firm tho' tender touches which command,
And yet persuade?
Why then the noble instrument breathes forth
Its full s ul to the trembling air, in sounds
Obedient to the player—sighs, sobs, sings,
Laughs, weeps, or wails according to his will,
And fills the ear with sweetest cadences.

Oh, ye who listen to the violin!
Try to be lenient, for 'tis harder far
To get a pure-toned melody from those four strings
Than to play rippling passages upon
A keyboard where the notes are ready made
And only waiting for the fingers to press down.

N.B.—The writer begs to apologise to any who think that in the last few lines the violin has been extolled to the disparagement of the pianoforte or the work of playing it. No such disparagement is intended, but it is generally acknowledged that the violin thoroughly well played bears the palm for being able to express the finest shades of feeling and emotion, and ranks next to the organ. If the latter is the king of instruments, the former is certainly the prince.

ELLEN L. BROWN.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Church Times revives the subject of village orchestras, or, to be more precise, of their use in Parish Churches. He mentions a case in which the ordinary musical resources of worship are supplemented by a small band, apparently with success. There is an excellent organ, and the band consists of four violins, viola, violoncello, double bass, and two cornets. The writer adds: "The point is that this village orchestra regularly accompanies the Missa Cantata in the Parish Church every Sunday in the year. For this reason there is an utter absence of fuss, show, or the intrusion of self; while, of course, from such constant rendering of the music at Mass, varied as that is from time to time, there is smoothness, regularity, and a quiet devotional rendering which is only attainable from perpetual practice and use—use in church most of all." Equally good results might be obtained with a proper effort in churches where they do not celebrate "Mass," and I recommend this excellent example for imitation.

THE accounts of the late Bristol Festival have been issued to guarantors and other persons interested. It should be premised that they are not restricted to the Festival, but cover the entire proceedings of the Society during the triennial period which that series of performances closed. The proceedings in question include two Orchestral Concerts and the conduct of singing classes in various parts of the city. It appears that the Concerts resulted in a loss, but interest chiefly gathers round the Festival, and to that I confine my attention.

IT is discouraging to note a decrease in attendance of 762 as compared with 1890, the figures being 8,428 and 9,190. The committee account for this by reference to bad times, and even congratulate themselves that the falling-off was not greater, thus showing a cheerfully philosophic spirit. From the sale of Festival tickets the sum of £3,622 was received; but the outgoings were, I regret to say, much greater. The principal vocalists cost £1,218, Sir C. Hallé and his orchestra received £1,329, and other expenses brought the total disbursements to the large figure of £4,492. It does not appear that the committee are at all disheartened by the fact that they owe £1,923 to their treasurer. They will call up £4 10s. on every guarantee of £10, and they announce that another Festival will be held in 1896, when we may hope for better conditions. Meanwhile, steps are being taken to obtain other support than that given by purchase of Festival tickets.

I SEE that the Pall Mall Gazette of November 25 made a feature of a story which was for some time familiar in musical circles, and, in passing from mouth to mouth, no doubt went through the usual process. I had forgotten all about it when the enterprising, yet belated, P. M. G. gave it the honours of print. According to this version, a certain Festival committee were advised by a certain lady, who takes an interest in musical matters, that a certain Oratorio by a certain composer was in daily use at a certain Royal Court, and that its choice for the next Festival would be pleasing in high quarters. Upon this, it was resolved to ascertain, through a certain gentleman, whether the august Head of the Court had any feeling at all in the matter. The august Head, it turned out, had not, but expressed a plain opinion that ladies should not tell what, in the case of a man, would be described as a lie. Now this "chestnut," I may as well say, belonged originally to one of the best raconteurs in the musical profession. What that involves anybody acquainted with the genus raconteur can quite easily imagine.

MISS AMY HARE gave a Concert in Taunton lately, and had, I regret to learn, a scanty audience. But the occasion was fruitful in drawing from "C. S.," a correspondent of the Somerset County Gazette, a heart-touching threnody. I quote the peroration: "Taunton! (ah! you are not alone) who could have dreamed a child of thine should thus interpret the greatest of the poets in the music world—and yet so finely. Well might'st thou be proud of her, and yet thou knowest not, for had'st thou known thy people would have flocked to welcome her. It was a treat—a more than splendid poem well portrayed—from the light dance to the dream of the dreamer, and on and on again. Who could fail to recognise the hand of the master in the power, as in the soft melody and rhythmic flow of tone. Aye! the picture was perfect—the landscape full—whether of joy or sorrow." So far, good; but why, oh! why did the prose poet end with "Thanks, Amy"?

MR. JEROME HOPKINS is making himself a terror to a certain class of defaulters on the other side of the Atlantic. He tours as a giver of "piano lecture Concerts," and wherever the attendance is poor, and promises of subscription are not redeemed, he makes the fact known per hand-bill. An example is now before me. "In Montclair," says Mr. Hopkins, "12 persons paid 54 dollars; 13 subscribers paid nothing." Similarly in Orange, 18 paid and 40 did not; in Elizabeth, the figures were 12 and 45; in Port

Richmond, they were 5 and 55, and a gentleman is openly named as a defaulter. Other places and persons are mentioned in this remarkable document, which ends with a moral: "If you have a child, teach him to dig potatoes or blacken boots, but not to play piano in Montclair, Orange, Elizabeth," &c., &c.

I do not read the Meister, but I have a friend who does, and acts like one of the ingenious machines which, from a mighty and deadly current of electricity, take enough for ordinary use with the minimum of risk. My friend tells me that a recent number of the Meister contains a review in which a Mr. Finck, who, I believe, writes about music in New York, is blamed for bestowing, in his "Life of Wagner," so much attention upon that master's critics. Thus we have Mr. Finck abusing the critics, and the Meister taking Mr. Finck to task for noticing them! This is a peculiarly domestic affair, and it is not for a stranger to interfere. But the poor critics! Mr. Finck hates them and runs amok; the Meister despises them as not worth powder and shot. Their continued existence under these distressing circumstances is a marvel, especially as, like a certain famous bird, they do not seem one penny the worse.

Before me lies, in dress of yellow and scarlet, a volume of 105 pages, entitled "How to Understand Classical Music," inscribed to Sir Augustus Harris, and written by Mr. Frank Parkinson, F.S.S., M.P.S. Its contents are of the most varied description, some instructive and tersely put, as in this sentence, "You want to give out the voice you have, and if you have only 2s. do not try to give 2s. 6d." ; some instructive and amusing, as when the author says, "Be not misled; musical culture is spontaneous, and the holy muse will not be mocked with the frigid illusion that it must be encompassed with mathematical considerations conserved within a superficial routine." It is not my business to review the little book, but there are reasons, easily deducible from the quotations made, why it is worth a reference.

Time and opportunity serving, I peruse with considerable interest the musical criticisms which appear in small provincial papers. They often show inexperience coupled with efforts to hide it that simply expose it the more, but sometimes one meets with a freshness of feeling and, occasionally, a form of expression very acceptable to men who are tired of conventional utterances. The other day I read that Brahms's Clarinet Quintet "would have seduced anyone but an anchorite." I, with the greatest admiration for that work, never said anything half so good about it, and I make my provincial colleague a bow of mingled admiration and envy.

The same writer, however, puzzles me by his observations upon Haydn's "Emperor" Quartet, of which he speaks as "a hearty and animated illustration of the composer who has attained a certain level of social life, and who seeks rather to indicate than avoid certain social contrasts." No doubt the application of these words to the Quartet and to Haydn was, in the mind of the critic, perfectly clear, but I cannot see it for the life of me. How does the music bear upon a certain level (what level?) of social life? and how does it show that the composer desired to point out, rather than ignore certain social contrasts (what contrasts?)? I ask these questions seriously, and beg the critic to throw a full light upon a matter of perfectly fresh interest.

My provincial brother, in the same suggestive article, complains that more fire might have been introduced into the playing of Beethoven's Septet, and adds: "A performance in which each player is apparently counting 'one, two, three, four' does not suit modern ideas, and the sooner this is understood the better." Here, again, is vagueness, unless we are to understand that modern ideas are in favour of dash at the expense of accuracy. Perhaps someone will explain.

All things considered, it is surprising how few musicians have met with a violent death at the hands of their rivals and enemies. They belong to an irritable tribe, lead conspicuous lives, and exist in an atmosphere of intrigue. Yet, even in the days when swords were worn, and the duello was everywhere in practice, some "sweet little cherub" had the sons of Apollo under his powerful protection. Stradella, it is true, perished at an assassin's hand, and Handel and Mattheson came to cut and thrust, in an informal sort of way, but with a deadly intent which required a sturdy button to make it inocuous. With most rare exceptions, however, as far as my memory serves me at the moment, musicians have all died peacefully in their beds.

A few days since there was a thrill of alarm lest the rule should be broken in the case of Boïto. I have nothing to do with the grounds of quarrel between the composer of "Mefistofele" and the publisher of "Cavalleria." But we all had reason for concern when news came that Boïto had spoken plainly about Sonzogno, that Sonzogno had retorted with equal plainness upon Boïto; that Boïto had challenged Sonzogno to combat with pistols; that Sonzogno had picked up the glove, and that arrangements for a "meeting" were in progress. We asked each other, with fear and trembling: "What about 'Nero' now? Long years we have waited patiently for 'Nero' and is the life of its author to be cut short before achievement?"

Continental duels are not looked upon very seriously. If fought with swords, a scratch in the arm usually satisfies honour, and the combatants take breakfast together. But the pistol is dangerous, in the first place, and chiefly, to the unaccustomed man who uses it, and next, to the opponent, because the more such a man strives to miss the more he is likely to hit. I believe that Signor Sonzogno would not hurt a hair of Boïto's head and therein lay the danger of putting a bullet through the head itself. So we waited, palpitating, till the good news came that Signor Ricordi, the Lord Rosebery of the quarrel, had intervened and brought dispute to an end. The situation, and "Nero," were saved! As a recognition of good Providence, Boïto should now finish "Nero."

The jubilee of Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" was observed both in London and Edinburgh on Monday, November 27. Sir Augustus Harris gave a performance of the ever-green work at Drury Lane Theatre, where it was produced fifty years ago, and the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company did the same at the Lyceum in the Scottish capital. These were graceful acts by way of honour to an opera which has charmed two generations of men and still retains its power to attract. We may take it that no composer, present or future, will write a work on the same lines, and perhaps it is not requisite he should. But that is no reason why we should forget the old favourite, from which so much of pleasure has passed to a weary world.

Our Welsh friends, as the national fever becomes hotter amongst them, are more and more disposed to regard everything English as foreign. Hence, like the French, they sometimes stumble at English names. In noticing a book of carols the other day, even such a well-known and esteemed paper as the Caermarthen Journal went wrong, speaking of the publishers as Messrs. Nevell, Ewen & Co., and of the editor as Sir John Staines! No doubt that we on this side of the Marches make a terrible mess of Welsh nomenclature, but there is some excuse for us.

In "Salad for the Solitary, by an Epicure," a book published forty years ago (by some attributed to Dr. Doran), there is a chapter entitled "Citations from the Cemeteries," and in that chapter an epitaph on a Welsh organ blower:

> Under this stone lies Meredith Morgan,
> Who blew the bellows of our church organ,
> Tobacco he hated, to smoke most unwilling,
> Yet never so pleased as when pipes he was filling;
> No reflection on him for rude speech could be cast,
> Though he made our old organ give many a blast.
> No puffer was he, though a capital blower,
> He could fill double G, and now lies a note lower.

The "old organ" was evidently a "G," and the last line should be read in connection with the fact.

A lady of title announces, through the Church Times, that she wants "a strong young man, over twenty years of age, as odd man, to carry coals all over a country house, and make himself generally useful." It is added that he must be able to sing tenor in choir. The proffered wages are not stated, but it should have been laid down how much will be given for carrying coals all over the house and how much for singing tenor. The dignity of art demands some sort of line between the coalheaver and the vocalist.

Verily we are, in some respects, a curious people. We imprison the English publisher of Zola's works, and lionise the author. We—that is the more sober and serious part of us—profess a holy horror of French comic operas, and yet before me lies an advertisement headed Trinity Church Choir, and announcing that the members and friends of the choir will give two performances of "Les Cloches de Corneville." The promise, however, is not absolute, the qualifying D.V. being conspicuous. Those initials are lovely, unsurpassable!

What has come to Mr. Philip Hale? He is one of the few American critics to whom I have looked up with respect, and I am not going to abandon the attitude; nevertheless, I have received a shock. Speaking of a certain work, he makes the composer say: "I purpose to be so crabbed in style, so high in thought, that the approach to the musical unintelligible will be applauded frantically by all who find their intellectuality flattered by the stating of this problem in a concert hall." And the work? Well, it was Brahms's Symphony in C minor!

This is depressing, but worse remains. Mr. Hale finds support for his opinions in some very depreciatory remarks on Brahms as a man, by Mr. W. Beatty Kingston. The tendency of those remarks was to depict Brahms as a blusterer, and Mr. Hale looks upon the Symphony as the "apotheosis of arrogance!" O, brothers, is it of any use for us to go on speaking and writing words about music? We cannot agree about anything, and, seeing how impossible is the intercommunication of temperaments, we may as well give up trying.

It was a happy thought of Mr. Leonard Borwick and Mr. Plunket Greene to join forces, and give a Recital, half vocal, half instrumental. Unless under very exceptional circumstances, two hours with a pianist alone, or a singer alone, is not a case of entirely sustained enjoyment. I understand that Messrs. Borwick and Greene intend to make a tour of the provinces in pleasant association. They will be welcome wherever good taste in music—matter and manner—prevails.

On several occasions Miss Janotha has been styled Madame Janotha—of course, quite in good faith. To this, because having no claim to the prefix, she very strongly objects. She asks me to make this fact known, that the error, a most distasteful one to her, may be avoided for the future. Miss Janotha has lately been on a visit to Lady Tennyson, with whom she is associated in preparing another series, set to music, of the late Laureate's songs.

At the Popular Concert in which Paderewski took part the other day, a wag in the upper gallery loudly suggested that some of the cheering was due to the artist's hair. The highly respectable public in the stalls resented this with curious fierceness, hissing and crying "Turn him out." Some folk are not good recipients of a joke which hurts.

It is curious to note how eminent musical names repeat themselves lower down. I have just read an opinion of a little piece by "George Handel"! The Frederic has, no doubt, been offered to Modesty as a propitiatory sacrifice.

An American opinion of Slivinsky: "He splashes, flounders, bangs, and crushes."

Joseph Bennett.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Nearly a quarter of a century had elapsed since Handel's last Oratorio, "Jephtha," had been heard in London when it was once more revived at the Albert Hall on the 7th ult. The circumstances of the previous revival at the Oratorio Concerts carried on for some years under the management of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., with Sir Joseph (then Mr.) Barnby as Conductor, are sufficiently interesting to warrant some recapitulation. In 1868, or thereabouts, considerable agitation was felt in musical, or, to speak more strictly, in vocal circles, respecting the ridiculously high pitch adopted in England, and Mr. Sims Reeves, who was among the most prominent advocates for a change, agreed to sing at six of the above-named performances in St. James's Hall, at which the Continental diapason normal was to be adopted. Though not, perhaps, as successful as could be wished, the movement has had lasting results, for the pitch has not been further heightened in this country, and in some quarters the diapason normal, or some more or less satisfactory compromise, has been maintained. The question will, of course, never be permanently adjusted until it is regarded as of sufficient importance for governmental interference, and of this there is little likelihood just yet. Reverting to "Jephtha," the main reason why the work, which was penned during the period when Handel was suffering from the weakness of sight which speedily resulted in total blindness, has not taken a prominent position in the repertory of London and provincial choral societies, is probably the paucity of those monumental choruses with which we chiefly associate the name of the Anglo-Saxon master. "When his loud voice" is a magnificent number, and a determined endeavour to encore it at the Albert Hall performance was eventually successful. "How dark, O Lord, are Thy decrees," is also extremely impressive, in spite of the wretched doggerel verses to which Handel has wedded his majestic music. Of the music for solo voices, the splendid recitative "Deeper, and deeper still," and the lovely air "Waft her, angels," which are usually brought into association in the concert-room, of course must be numbered among the composer's choicest inspirations. The airs allotted to Iphis, Jephtha's hapless daughter, are light and pretty, and the contralto music includes a fine song, "Scenes of horror, scenes of woe." The part of Hamor, originally written for male soprano, was, on this occasion, cut down to a single recitative, and many other numbers were omitted without, perhaps, any great loss of effect. The additional accompaniments supplied by Sir Arthur Sullivan for the memorable revival on February 5, 1869, were used, and may be regarded on the whole as extremely judicious. Mrs. Henschel, Miss Agnes Janson, Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Norman Salmond were all praiseworthy as the soloists, and the choruses received the fullest possible justice from Sir Joseph Barnby's splendidly trained choir.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, played at the third Concert, on the 6th ult., had not been heard in London, we believe, for about fifteen years. It came, therefore, to many with the charm of absolute novelty, and to others with that of freshness and familiarity combined. To the latter the opportunity was valuable as a means of testing previously formed opinions. These discovered that the grandeur, beauty, and poetic power of the first movement not only easily stood the test of time, but were so far in excess of anything to be found in the rest of the Symphony that even such merits as the remaining movements undoubtedly possess, scarcely found recognition. Rubinstein has shown that he sets little store on the unity of his original conception, for he has added, at various times, no less than three movements to the four of which the work at first consisted. Bearing this in mind, it is impossible not to wish that the magnificent first movement could be detached from the Symphony, and played, as it deserves to be, very often—but alone. It may fall short of its tremendous theme—who that is reasonable would expect otherwise?—none the less is it a remarkably successful effort to deal with the impossible; all the more praiseworthy too, that it makes no attempt to achieve results by lapses into "realism." That one so gifted as the composer of this work should have squandered, as he has done, the legacy of the gods, is not to be borne with patience. The new violinist, Miss Beatrice Langley, gave a very artistic reading of Spohr's Ninth Concerto. Her tone is pure, her bowing and intonation excellent, and her phrasing full of intelligence and charm. Weber's glorious scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," which appropriately preceded the Symphony, was sung with a thorough appreciation of its dramatic requirements by Mrs. Elene Eaton, a soprano with a voice of extensive range and quite exceptional power. The Concert, which was conducted by Mr. Henschel with customary maestria, began with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Some idea of the varied and cosmopolitan character of the Concert held on Saturday, November 25, may be gathered from the fact that German, Italian, French, Russian, and British composers were all represented in the programme. Herr Julius Klengel's Violoncello Concerto in A minor (No. 3), which was introduced for the first time in England by the composer, is a concise and workmanlike rather than attractive composition, but afforded Herr Klengel ample scope for the display of his remarkable technique. He was warmly applauded later on for his performance of pieces by Godard, Hans Sitt, and Piatti. The orchestra were at their best in Mendelssohn's sunny "Italian" Symphony, and excellent performances were also given of Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, the Introduction to the first Act of "Aida," and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's spirited orchestral ballad "The Ship o' the Fiend." Mr. Eugène Oudin was as artistic as ever in César Franck's "La Procession" and Massenet's "Pensée d'Automne," and gained an encore for a "Serenade" by Tschaikowsky.

An unusually large audience was attracted by the Concert of the 2nd ult., the programme of which was entirely devoted to the compositions of Wagner. It had been originally announced that Madame Moran-Olden would take part in the Concert, but, as she was disabled by indisposition, the directors were obliged to procure a substitute, Madame Giulia Valda undertaking at short notice to sing the music in the "Tannhäuser" selection. The Concert opened with the "Meistersinger" Overture, which was played with considerable spirit, though here, as in the case of other numbers in the programme, the tempi adopted by Mr. Manns by no means invariably accorded with those of Bayreuth, while the strings were somewhat overweighted by the brass in the more sonorous portions of the Overture. Mr. Andrew Black followed with an animated and intelligent reading of "Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde," from "Die Walküre." Mr. Black's voice is hardly massive enough in its lower register for an ideal representative of Wotan, but his incisive declamatory style enabled him to render a fair measure of justice to this exacting scene. The "Feuerzauber" music which followed was perhaps the least satisfactory performance at the Concert, as the prayer from "Rienzi," admirably delivered by Mr. Lloyd, was its most conspicuously successful feature. A highly creditable rendering of the Vorspiel to "Parsifal" and the third Act of "Tannhäuser" completed the programme. In the last-named excerpt the parts of Venus and Elizabeth were doubled by Madame Valda, who sang the famous prayer in Italian, while Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Black, and the chorus adopted the vernacular version, an arrangement which lent a certain incongruity to the performance. Tannhäuser's narrative of his journey to Rome was splendidly sung by Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Black was highly successful in the address to the "Star of Eve." The Crystal Palace Choir acquitted itself very satisfactorily in the Pilgrims' choruses.

Mr. Paderewski was the great attraction of the Concert of the 9th ult., all the seats having been sold out nearly a fortnight previously. The hall was packed to its utmost capacity, and a number of persons, who had been unable to obtain admission, stationed themselves with their ears to the walls, eagerly drinking in such stray sounds as filtered through chinks and crevices from within. Mr. Paderewski's principal solo was his Polish Fantasia, which has already been discussed in these columns on the occasion of its production at the Norwich Festival in October. The orchestral accompaniments were well, though by no means perfectly played, and the work was received with the greatest enthusiasm. Later on, Mr. Paderewski gave a familiar Nocturne by Chopin with great beauty of touch and delicacy of sentiment, and displayed his wonderful technique in Liszt's brilliant transcription of the "Spinnerlied" from the "Flying Dutchman"—a really marvellous performance: and in Rubinstein's showy, but meretricious "Valse Caprice." Mr. Manns secured admirable renderings of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful Overture to "Parisina," the charmingly poetic Intermezzo, "On the Waters," from Dr. Mackenzie's "Jason"; Beethoven's Symphony in D (No. 2), and the Overture to "William Tell." The vocalist, Madame Ada Patterson, sang the aria, "Ah infelice," from the "Flauto Magico," in a neat, but unimpressive style, and gained an encore for a rendering of Grieg's "Solvejg's Song," to which the same epithets are applicable.

In the programme of the Concert of the 16th ult. certain modifications had to be made, owing to the inability, through illness, of Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler—an American pianist who has met with brilliant success at Berlin—and of Mr. William Ludwig to fulfil their engagements. An efficient substitute was found for the latter in Miss Meredyth Elliot, a clever singer, well-known on the ballad platform, whose well-trained contralto was displayed to advantage in Mr. Henschel's Spinning Song and the favourite aria "O Fatima, etereo dono," from Weber's "Abu Hassan." Mr. Schönberger filled the vacancy caused by Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler's regretted absence, playing Rubinstein's D minor Concerto and a group of pieces by Chopin in his wonted brilliant, though occasionally unsympathetic style. Mr. German, who conducted in the absence of Mr. Manns, and showed marked ability in his control of the orchestra, directed a most successful performance of his very clever and attractive Symphony in A minor—composed for and produced at the recent Norwich Festival—as well as of a selection from his picturesque incidental music to "Henry VIII."

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

In order to make the record of these performances complete it is necessary to refer briefly to the Concert of Saturday, November 25, in which Mozart's Quartet in G (No. 1 of the set dedicated to Haydn) and Rheinberger's deservedly popular Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38) were the concerted works in the programme. Mr. Schönberger was the pianist on this occasion, and his brilliant and expressive rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 1) so pleased the audience that an encore was peremptorily demanded, the artist's response being Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor, No. 2 of "Das Wohltemperirte Clavier." Mr. Piatti played his own piece, entitled "Ossian's Song," as he alone could play it; and Mr. Robertson was acceptable in Handel's somewhat hackneyed air "Where'er you walk" and two agreeable little songs by Harvey Löhr.

On the following Monday a Quartet in G, by Professor Villiers Stanford, was performed for the first time. It was composed in 1891 and is dedicated to the Newcastle Chamber Music Society. As a matter of course, the four movements are orthodox in structure and detail, proceeding from such a profound musician, but the Quartet commands admiration on higher grounds. Attention may be drawn to the impressive passage immediately preceding the recapitulation in the first movement, the delightful Poco allegro e grazioso in the tonic minor which stands in place of a Scherzo, and the masterly contrapuntal writing in the Finale. The performance, by Lady Hallé and her associates, was excellent on the whole, but some curious sounds were heard, which were of course at the time regarded as eccentricities on the part of the composer. Mr. Piatti, however, subsequently wrote to a daily paper stating that the faults were his, owing to the fact that, having broken his own spectacles, he had donned a pair which he found too late did not suit his eyesight. The Quartet was warmly received, and Professor Stanford bowed his acknowledgments. Schubert's magnificent Pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 100) and Chopin's Fantasia in F minor (Op. 49) intelligently, though not altogether satisfactorily played by Mr. Schönberger, completed the instrumental works in the programme, and some French vocal duets by Chaminade, Saint-Saëns, and Godard were sung with perfect finish and expression by Mr. and Mrs. Oudin.

On Saturday, the 2nd ult., Professor Stanford's Quartet in G was repeated, and pleased as much as on the previous occasion. Indeed, the slow movement in E flat, which seemed rather vague on a first hearing, improved greatly on acquaintance. Miss Janotha gave a remarkably quiet and unassuming performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor (the "Moonlight") and Lady Hallé gave the Adagio from Dvorák's Violin Concerto with pianoforte accompaniment (Op. 53), the Concert ending with Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47). Mr. Oudin was heard to the utmost advantage in airs by Stradella and Tschaikowsky.

Another novelty was introduced at the Concert on Monday, the 4th ult., this being a Quartet in G by Antonio Bazzini, an Italian composer, born at Brescia in 1818. He is not entirely unknown in this country, but it cannot be said that his music has gained wide acceptance, perhaps on account of the idea unquestionably prevalent that if Italian composers can produce operas, their instrumental works in classical form are of little account. Bazzini, however, is well worth a hearing at times. In the earlier part of his career he was a brilliant violinist, and in 1873 he was appointed Professor of counterpoint and composition at the Milan Conservatoire. His works are chiefly for church and chamber, and the Quartet introduced on this occasion is his fourth. It is marked throughout by Italian grace and elegance, although it cannot be said that the themes are particularly fresh, and the treatment is certainly not marked by contrapuntal elaboration. In its phraseology the work, perhaps, may remind the hearer of Cherubini; but it is certainly inferior to the quartets of the Florentine master. In structure the first and second movements are not unimpeachable, the best section being the third, Tempo di Gavotta, a very graceful movement. Modern Italian art was also represented by an Andante Cantabile in D for violin, by Sgambati (Op. 24, No. 1), a very effective piece, beautifully played by Lady Hallé. The companion movement, "Serenata Napolitana," was given as an encore. Miss Janotha contented herself with Chopin's Barcarolle in F sharp (Op. 60), and was, of course, called upon for more. In response she gave the same master's Berceuse in D flat, both pieces being played with rare refinement of method. Miss Fillunger sang Lieder by Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Brahms in her customary artistic manner.

Bazzini's Quartet in G was repeated on the following Saturday, the programme likewise including Dvorák's magnificent Pianoforte Quintet in A (Op. 81) and Beethoven's Variations in E flat (Op. 35), Mr. Leonard Borwick giving a superb rendering of the last-named work. Mr. Klengel, who was the violoncellist at both Concerts this week, introduced a Romance in E by Volkmann (Op. 7), which he played with much effect. Miss Fillunger was again the vocalist.

Seldom in the history of these performances has more excitement been occasioned than on the 11th ult., when Mr. Paderewski was announced to make his only appearance this season. According to the most trustworthy authority, amateurs who were not provided with reserved seats began to arrive seven hours in advance. This hero-worship cannot be commended, but it is excusable, for musical genius is not always at command, and when found should be made a note of. The most popular, if not the greatest, pianist of the time gave an eloquent, if, perhaps, ultra-refined performance of Weber's Sonata in A flat, and took part in Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26). He also appeared as a composer in six songs, recently published, being musical illustrations of verses by his talented compatriot, Adam Mickiewicz. The words are characterised for the most part by tender sadness, and the music is delightfully weird and Slavonic. The songs were sung to perfection by Mr. Edward Lloyd, who used a crude English version which fails to do justice to the original lines. Mozart's Quintet in G minor completed the scheme. Some displeasure was caused by late arrivals, but this nuisance might be easily abated by the device adopted at other Concerts of compelling the laggards to wait until a pause before taking their seats.

Not much need be said concerning the last two Concerts of the year. On Saturday, the 16th ult., Schumann's somewhat rarely heard Quartet in F (Op. 41, No. 2) and Mozart's frequently performed Pianoforte Trio in E (No. 6) were the concerted works. Lady Hallé gave her favourite Handel's Violin Sonata in D, and Mr. Leonard Borwick Saint-Saëns's effective Caprice on the Ballet Airs from Gluck's "Alceste." The vocalist, Madame Frances Saville, included among her well-chosen songs Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Lord of our chosen race," from "Ivanhoe."

Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in C minor (Op. 60), both very fine examples of modern chamber music, not so frequently performed as their merits deserve, were included in the programme of Monday, the 18th ult. The pianist, who was again Mr. Leonard Borwick, interpreted Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11) with delightful refinement and perfect technique, and Madame Frances Saville was acceptable in airs by Handel, Mozart, and Schubert.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Two Concerts were given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society during the past month, at the handsome and spacious new Queen's Hall in Langham Place. At the first, a Smoking Concert on November 27, Duke Alfred of Saxe-Coburg was at his post as leader. The orchestral selections were played with much refinement and care, and greatly enjoyed by the numerous and distinguished company present. On the 6th ult. there was a "ladies' night," and a very large and brilliant company attended. The first part of the programme was devoted to the music of Gounod, and included the ballet airs from "Faust," rarely heard in performances of the opera in London; the Marche Réligieuse, the piquant "Funeral March of a Marionette," the Saltarello, the Overture to "Mireille," and vocal pieces contributed by Mdlle. Landi and Mr. Iver McKay. In the second part were Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise in F (No. 1), a selection from "Lohengrin," and minor pieces, vocal and instrumental. The Concert was ably conducted by Mr. George Mount.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, with which is associated a male-voice choir, gave its first Subscription Concert this season at St. James's Hall, on the 19th ult. As usual, under the intelligent direction of Mr. George Kitchin, an interesting programme was provided, including a due proportion of novelty. The first piece was a Dramatic Prelude in D, by Mr. G. E. Boys Street, suggested, it is said, by Mr. Richard Mansfield's performance a few years ago of the dual character of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." If not original in the strictest sense of the term the piece is very effective, the themes being well contrasted and the orchestration musicianly. The composer was called to the platform and cordially applauded. Another work unfamiliar to London amateurs was Sir Herbert Oakeley's Suite "In the Olden Style," which has been frequently played abroad, and was included in the scheme of the recent Cheltenham Festival. It is in five movements, and is old-fashioned rather in phraseology than in its tonality, which shifts in a manner entirely foreign to the custom of eighteenth century composers of suites. It is, however, bright and piquant, perhaps the most effective section being a Minuet and Trio in E flat, written originally for a play in which the students of the Edinburgh University took part. Haydn's Symphony in B flat (No. 4 of the Salomon set) and Gounod's charming Overture to "The Mock Doctor" completed the purely orchestral selections, all of which were vigorously and intelligently interpreted. The male-voice choir fully sustained its reputation for refined part-singing in several glees and part-songs, and Mr. Tivadar Nachèz was heard to moderate advantage in Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

On the 21st ult. the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Association gave a Concert at the Queen's Hall, which was well filled. The programme commenced with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and included Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's beautiful "Benedictus," the Spanish ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid," and a new Overture "May is come," by Mr. A. E. Wight. The last is an agreeable piece in a slightly pastoral style as befits its title. All the selections were well played, under the direction of Mr. Norfolk Megone; vocal pieces were contributed with much effect by Master Cyril Tyler and Miss Ada Tomlinson, and Mr. Simonetti played some violin solos acceptably.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The crowded state of St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the 19th ult., when the usual ante-Christmas Concert was given by the time-honoured school in Tenterden Street, showed the interest now taken in the Institution, in spite of the formidable rivalry with which it has to contend. Let us hasten to add that the performances afforded strong evidence, on the whole, that the training of the young people is being conducted on legitimate lines, and that budding talent, beyond the average, is contained in the ranks of the students. The most satisfactory display of executive ability was that of Miss Sybil Palliser, in Henselt's very trying Pianoforte Concerto in F minor. Though the tone she produced from her instrument was not powerful, the touch was excellent, and the false notes were very few and far between. Another feature of more than ordinary significance in the programme was a dramatic scena for mezzo-soprano, entitled "Alcestis," by Mr. Reginald Steggall (student), with words by Mr. Granville Bantock, a former student. It is an elaborate piece in a very modern style, the orchestration showing the influence of Wagner. The scena was artistically and even powerfully sung by Miss Edith M. Hands, whose low notes are of exceptionally fine quality. Commendation may be given to Mr. Harold E. Macpherson for his rendering of the Adagio and Rondo from Weber's neglected Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, and to Mr. Fritz W. Read for the promise he evinced in Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in G. The Concert was conducted by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The annual operatic performance given in connection with this establishment is awaited with interest, for musicians expect something out of the common in selection and achievement, and they were certainly not disappointed on the 6th ult., when Schumann's only lyric drama, "Genoveva," was given at Drury Lane Theatre, for the first time on any stage in this country. The work, produced at Leipzig in 1850, has never taken much hold of the public, even in Germany, where Schumann's genius was far more speedily recognised than with us. But the reasons for the comparative failure of the work are obvious. The composer's dreamy, reflective nature did not lend itself to the sharp, incisive style which should characterise dramatic music, and, misunderstanding the needs of an opera libretto, he altered the book furnished him, and taken from Hebbel's tragedy "Genoveva" and Tieck's on the same subject, the result being a singularly clumsy and ineffective treatment of an interesting story. The supernatural element in the libretto is especially absurd, and the characters, which should be life-like, are mere shadows. But it is in the style of the music that Schumann's hopeless inability to cope with a task of this nature is most fully apparent. He pours forth numberless beautiful themes and treats them in song or symphonic form, so that "Genoveva" is far more suitable to the concert-room than the operatic stage. As a cantata it was presented, with curtailments, by the Bach Choir on March 8, 1887, at St. James's Hall, and was in this guise, on the whole, more effective than on the occasion now under consideration, notwithstanding the great pains evidently taken to present the work in the most favourable light. Among pupils who were allotted leading parts Miss Una Bruckshaw, who impersonated the unjustly accused wife; Miss Kirkby Lunn, as the witch Margaret; Mr. Archdeacon and Mr. R. E. Davies displayed the most abundant promise. The voices of the young choralists were fresh and pure, and the orchestra was also highly commendable. Mr. Richard Temple was responsible for the stage arrangements, which were far above the average of "scratch" performances. Professor Villiers Stanford conducted with all needful care and vigilance.

The last Students' Concert in the old year took place on the 20th ult., and was orchestral, as usual. The programme contained two novelties, in the shape of compositions by present and past students. An Overture in G, for full orchestra, by Mr. H. Walford Davies, proved to be a singularly ripe work. An impressive Largo, in which the brass is felicitously employed, leads into a vigorous and impassioned Allegro; this contains some capital music, the subjects and their treatment being alike worthy of commendation. The second theme is an eloquent phrase, which speaks well for the young composer's melodic gifts. The orchestra is handled with much skill; sonority and effective contrasts of colour are features of the scoring, and the powerful Coda proves that he knows how to work up to an effective climax. Two love songs to Italian words ("Ove sei" and "Desio"), composed by Mr. Godfrey Pringle, were sung with sympathetic voice and style by Miss Maude Pierpoint. They are interesting little pieces well written for the voice, and, in their vocal phrases, happily suggestive of the style which obtains in the land of song. The orchestral accompaniments are full of colour; that of the second song being notable for sensuous charm. Chopin's F minor Concerto was played by Miss Gwendolyn Toms. We have frequently spoken highly of this young lady's performances; in some of these she may have displayed greater power and dash than on the occasion under notice, but she has never played with such delicacy and finish as in the Larghetto of Chopin's work. Miss Rina Allerton gave promise of future excellence as a dramatic singer in Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido," and Mr. Paul Ludwig's rendering of Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" deserves a special word of praise, for it was in every respect admirable; his cantabile is quite masterly. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in Brahms's superb Variations on a Theme by Haydn (Op. 56A) and Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody, which went with splendid spirit and abandon. Professor Stanford conducted.

The gold medal presented annually by Messrs. J. and J. Hopkinson for competition by pianists at the Royal College of Music was awarded by the Director and Board of Professors on the 13th ult. The competitors were five in number, and the medal was adjudged to Miss Gwendolyn Toms, who has been for two years Pringle Scholar of the College.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A performance, valuable as a lesson to the young people who took part in it, and interesting to musical amateurs generally, was given at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult., by pupils of the prosperous school on the Victoria Embankment. This was Handel's "Messiah," an Oratorio which, however much it may be loved in this country, is, as a rule, presented in a more or less curtailed form, the only exceptions being the performances at certain of the Festivals of the Three Choirs, where of course time is not such an important object as it is in busy London life. The numbers usually omitted according to time-honoured precedent include the airs "Thou art gone up on high" and "If God be for us," the duet "O Death, where is thy sting?" the second parts of the solos "He was despised" and "The trumpet shall sound," and the chorus "But thanks be to God." The task imposed upon the Guildhall students was extremely arduous, for, apart from the difficulties of the music, which it may surprise any who do not know "The Messiah" are considerable, the performance lasted, including a brief interval, more than three hours and a half. The efforts of the choir of 200 and the orchestra of 75 were, however, distinguished by unfailing care if not confidence, and though the attack may have been sometimes rather feeble, actual errors of importance were very few. The solos were divided among a large number of students, all of whom justified their appearance on a public concert platform, many displaying more than average promise. The performance was conducted by Sir Joseph Barnby.

QUEEN'S HALL.

The first public Concert given in this building took place on the 2nd ult., under the direction of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, the programme consisting of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" (preceded by the National Anthem) and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Madame Albani, Miss Margaret Hoare, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederick Dawson, the last-named of whom gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, which was the chief feature of the miscellaneous section. A choir had been got together for the occasion that testified alike to the ability of English singers and the discretion of Mr. Robert Newman, on whom the selection of voices had devolved. Nothing could have been finer than the rendering of the choral portions of Mendelssohn's work. Had the choir been rehearsed for months, it could scarcely have sung with greater unanimity of expression or attack, and the fact that this result was achieved in a few days only, deserves the fullest acknowledgment, if only for the benefit of future musical historians. In spite of its merit, however, the Concert was regarded chiefly as a test of the acoustic merits of the hall. These amply justified the claims that had been made. Every detail was heard with the utmost clearness, and in the loudest passages no trace of obscurity was apparent. A large audience had assembled, and its approval both of the hall and the performance was emphatic and unanimous. The organist was Mr. W. G. Wood, and the orchestra was led by Mr. G. H. Betjemann.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

It is greatly to the credit of this Society that the programme of the Concert on Monday, the 18th ult., should have included so important a novelty as Mr. F. H. Cowen's romantic legend "The Water Lily." The interest of the occasion was heightened by the engagement of the principal soloists who interpreted the work at Norwich—Madame Albani, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Norman Salmond. The subject of Mr. Cowen's cantata is one that is particularly suited to his musical temperament. It exhibits to the greatest advantage his faculty for dealing with fanciful, fairy-like scenes. Great praise is due to both chorus and orchestra for the sympathy they displayed with the spirit of the work, and the admirable manner in which they met the no slight demands of the music for executive precision and delicacy. These qualities were especially noticeable in the rendering of the Dream scene in the Prologue and the scene "On a Scilly Islet." The martial ardour of the chorus "Lance to lance," and the dramatic expectancy of the crowd as the various knights essay to arouse the heroine from her death-like sleep, were also excellently conveyed. Concerning the principal soloists, it is sufficient to say that they were all in excellent voice and that they each appeared to thoroughly enjoy singing again the melodious and effective numbers assigned to their respective parts. There only remains, therefore, to add that Mr. A. Strugnell was entrusted with the brief remarks of King Arthur, and that the work had a most cordial reception, Mr. Cowen being called to the platform at the close amidst the heartiest applause. The second part of the programme consisted of Mr. Edward German's popular Three Dances from the incidental music to "Henry VIII.," the scena "Softly sighs," sung by Madame Albani, and Mr. G. R. Betjemann's clever choral "Song of the Western Men," the effectiveness of which has been much increased by the recent revision by the composer of the orchestral parts. Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted throughout with his usual skill.

MESSRS. PLUNKET GREENE AND LEONARD BORWICK'S RECITAL.

A remarkably interesting performance was given by the two talented young artists above-named at St. James's Hall on Tuesday, the 5th ult., not the 6th, as by a curious error was stated on the programme. Mr. Borwick led off with Schumann's "Carnaval," of which he gave a rendering at once brilliant and intelligent, reminding the hearer, in some of the movements, of Madame Schumann's own reading. Mr. Plunket Greene then sang no fewer than seven songs by Martini, Handel, Beethoven, Cornelius, Jensen, Franz, and Holländer, with unfailing expression, though in the matter of vocal production he was not unimpeachable at times. The clever "Ein Ton" of Cornelius, in which the voice has only one note throughout while the accompaniment is as varied as possible, elicited a warm encore. Next came a group of minor pianoforte pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Chopin, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, and Paderewski, the Polish composer last-named being represented by a "Humoresque de Concert (genre Scarlatti)," in which the style of the old master is imitated with capital effect. For an encore Mr. Leonard Borwick gave Brahms's "Cradle Song" from his pieces (Op. 117). The Recital concluded with six numbers of "Songs of the Four Nations," arranged by Arthur Somervell. These included examples of English, Welsh, Manx, Cornish, and Irish ditties, all interesting in their several ways. The Recital was an unqualified success and attracted a very large audience.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The lecturer at the Royal College of Organists on the 5th ult. was Mr. J. Hamilton Clarke, who read a paper entitled "Two years' music in Australia, by one of the survivors." The paper gave an interesting and graphic account of the two years' life of the unsuccessful National Orchestral Society formed to carry on the Concerts conducted by Mr. F. H. Cowen at the Melbourne Exhibition.

Mr. Clarke, as Conductor of the new Society, had many peculiar and unique experiences which were amusingly narrated, and several useful hints and suggestions were given to those who might purpose pursuing a musical career in the Colonies.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

AT the December meeting of the Musical Association Mr. W. H. Cummings gave an erudite and attractive discourse upon "The Art of Clavier playing, Past and Present." Before the middle of the fourteenth century, the speaker said, the art could scarcely be said to have existed. Organists of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were called pulsators, or strikers, owing to the notes of their instruments being struck by the clenched fist. Subsequently engravings showed the notes being depressed by all the fingers straightened out. When organ-builders provided keyboards which permitted the fingers being used separately, their straight horizontal position was still maintained, and this was the cause of the thumb being regarded as useless, since its comparative shortness prevented its reaching the keyboard so long as the fingers were thus extended. The earliest mention of fingering was found in a book published in 1571 by Ammerbach. In this the thumb was indicated by O and the fingers by 1, 2, 3, 4. This fingering prevailed in Germany down to 1741. After that date the thumb was indicated as the first finger. In 1599, however, a book was published in England entitled "Lessons on the Virginals," in which the thumb was indicated by the figure 1. The employment of × for the thumb in England was attributable to German musicians who migrated to this country. Amongst these was Rudolph Falkner, who published in England in 1762 "Instructions for playing the Harpsichord," in which the thumb was marked by a ×. This system was adopted by Clementi, who came to London in 1777, and by Dussek, who arrived eleven years later; both became London music publishers, and with the unfortunate result that the old English method of fingering, which certainly dated from 1599, was supplanted by the bad German method. When Bach began his musical studies fingering in Germany was in a most chaotic state. By curving his fingers he was able to utilise the thumb, and upon this he established a method for himself. There could be little doubt, however, but that he derived his ideas of fingering from Couperin, whose method was published in 1717 in "L'Art de toucher le Clavecin." In the preface of this work Couperin said, "The method which I give you here is unique." Phillip Emanuel Bach spoke of the improvements in fingering made by his father, but it was a mistake to suppose that their systems were identical. Bach, for instance, passed the middle finger over the first; his son prohibited this action. From Ph. E. Bach and Handel to the present time there had been practically no change in the method of fingering the keyboard. It should be remembered, however, that the effect was produced not by the method, but by the ability of the performer who used it. In conclusion, Mr. Cummings expressed his opinion that, provided a good technic had first been acquired on the pianoforte, practising on an organ would be beneficial rather than otherwise to students at the former instrument.

Considerable difference of opinion prevailed during the subsequent discussion relative to the production of a "singing tone" on the pianoforte; the Chairman, Mr. Banister, maintaining that it was caused by finger pressure on the keys, and Mr. Walter Wesché and Mr. Gilbert Webb arguing that the pianoforte notes could only be made to sound by a blow.

MUSICAL GUILD.

A PROGRAMME of exceptional interest had been arranged for the third of the current series of these excellent Concerts, on November 28. The original version for two pianofortes, two violoncellos, and horn, of Schumann's well-known Theme and Variations (Op. 46) was performed for the first time in England. As might have been anticipated, the two violoncellos had a difficult task to make themselves heard against two powerful Broadwood grands, and the horn, which should have given a touch of colour to the whole, was most inadequately played; in fact, for the second half of the work it was not heard at all, so that it cannot be said that this novelty was given in accordance with the "composer's intention." It is only right to add that the horn player was not a member of the Guild. Brahms's magnificent Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26) completed the programme, and was well played by Miss Annie Fry, Miss Isabella Donkersley, Messrs. A. Hobday and Paul Ludwig. The last three artists were joined by Messrs. W. Sutcliffe and Percy Kearne in Mr. Holmes's Quintet; and Miss Annie Grimson and Mr. F. Sewell were responsible for the pianoforte parts, with Messrs. P. Ludwig and J. T. Field for the violoncello parts in Schumann's work. Mr. E. H. Yeo was the vocalist. The last Concert, on the 12th ult., opened with a highly satisfactory rendering, by Messrs. Bent, Sutcliffe, Hobday, and Ludwig, of Beethoven's String Quartet in F (Op. 95), in which the excellence of the ensemble told of painstaking rehearsals. Mr. Paul Ludwig played Brahms's Violoncello Sonata (Op. 99), and by his capital performance justified his choice of this beautiful but difficult work. Miss Grimson was commendable as the pianist. Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 80) was the third concerted piece, and received a spirited interpretation from Miss Fry, Miss Donkersley, and Mr. Ludwig. Miss Florence Shee sang songs in English, German, and French.

LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the members of the London Gregorian Choral Association was held on the 14th ult., at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Churchyard, when the hon. secretary, Mr. R. A. Turner, read a report of the past year's proceedings, which showed that the Society had made most satisfactory progress and had now no pecuniary liabilities. At the conclusion of the business proceedings, Mr. H. B. Briggs read a paper, entitled "Plainsong, the Church's liturgical music." Mr. Briggs endeavoured to prove that not only was plainsong theoretically and practically the best possible musical setting of the Church service, but that the English Church had no right to use any other. The lecturer also said that it was time we cleared our minds "from the cant of trusting to the reputed opinions of eminent musicians about the beauty of plainsong . . . for a more dreary affair than plainsong in a Continental Cathedral under the old régime could not be imagined. A one-finger performance on the nursery pianoforte of the 'Blue Bells of Scotland' was wild and festive in comparison. The plainsong that could be heard anywhere within the last twenty years was merely the fossil remains of the old chant which had been turned into stone by the medium of modern music." The only great musician who was capable of giving an opinion on plainsong was Gounod, who, after a visit to the Abbey of Solesmes, had written as follows: "You close your eyes and open your ears, all to hear this marvellous music, just as you would at a real concert of artists; and you soon forget that you are in the nineteenth century, except so far as the execution recalls that of the best performers of the present day, including those at the Opera. And yet it is plainsong that these monks are chanting; but a plainsong so cantabile with its pneume-forming motives, and its notes not horribly long and uniformly funereal like those that the ignorant singers of our parish churches swallow up and spit out at us from their yawning jowls. Here, on the contrary, you listen to a charming and brilliant succession of Psalms, hymns, antiphons, &c., the motives of which are always so varied that the one, two, three hours of service pass in an enchantment of your whole being." It was this authentic method of chanting which was essentially the music of the Church. Plainsong differed from modern music in three particulars—viz., tonality, rhythm, and absence of vocal harmonics. Its tonality consisted of eight modes, its rhythm on syllabic accentuation. It was this latter peculiarity that made plainsong so uniquely suited to the prose of the Church service.

During the reading of the paper, various portions of the Church Liturgy were well sung according to the traditions of the monks of Solesmes by the choir of the Plainsong and Mediæval Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Abdy Williams.

CATFORD CHORAL SOCIETY.

On the 19th ult. this Society, conducted by Mr. A. Furse, gave the first Concert of its new season at St. James's Hall, Forest Hill. The programme consisted of Bennett's "May Queen," and a selection of songs, part-songs, &c. The singing of the choir was again notable for finish and the careful attention paid to dynamic nuances and distinct declamation. Interest was lent to the occasion by the production of a new choral work of more than average merit, a setting as a ballad for chorus and orchestra of Scott's "Young Lochinvar," by Mr. A. Davidson Arnott. The composer has treated the poem with the freedom necessary for an appropriately dramatic musical illustration of so dramatic a subject, and while this has not resulted in formlessness, there is, on the other hand, perhaps too little in the way of broad choral development to satisfy the average chorus-singer. In Mr. Arnott's work the chorus has to be ever on the alert to follow the frequent changes of rhythm, time, and especially of mood. From this it may be inferred that it will prove effective with choirs which can appreciate and do justice to a work which is dramatic in the best sense of the word. Mr. Arnott has had no difficulty in supplying the requisite local colour; in fact, his music "smells" of "brown heath and shaggy wood," and the characteristics of Scotch music are so felicitously and spontaneously reproduced that there can be no doubt as to his nationality. The fine, dashing opening phrase, of which excellent use has been made, could only have been penned by a Scotch musician; this remark applies to many pages in a score which contains much that is fresh, unconventional, and interesting, both in the vocal parts and accompaniments. The ballad was sung by Mr. Furse's chorus in capital style, and the composer was several times enthusiastically called at the finish. He is undoubtedly a young musician of great promise, from whom much good work may be expected. The rest of the programme may be briefly dismissed, but mention must be made of Mr. Charles Magrath's splendid delivery of two songs by Mr. Arnott, "Give a rouse," and for an encore, "I love thee"; the latter is a beautiful specimen of love music—a broad, impassioned melody of deep pathos, and yet simple withal.

DR. F. J. SAWYER'S "ORPHEUS."

The Brighton and Hove Choral and Orchestral Society, at its Concert at the Dome, on the 7th ult., produced the new dramatic cantata "Orpheus," the work of its energetic and accomplished Conductor, to which was awarded the prize of £100 in the recent competitions inaugurated by Messrs. Methven, Simpson and Co., of Edinburgh. The libretto—the result of collaboration with "some artistic friends"—is well defined, poetic, and musical. It is divided into three scenes: "On the banks of the Styx," "The Meeting," "The Journey." The music is written for four soloists, chorus, and orchestra (an Appendix contains directions for adapting the work when only two soloists are available). Orpheus and his Eurydice are represented by the soprano and tenor, whilst the contralto and baritone alternate with, and give additional variety to, the chorus in descriptive and reflective passages according to classic precedent. Scene I. opens with a sombre and unrestful Introduction, appropriate and original both in matter and orchestration. Before the chorus (without soprani) enters to the same music, with the words "Here in a world that is no world," some use is made of the Orpheus motive. In No. 2, Orpheus appears, seeking his lost bride; and No. 3, "Charon, thou sittest like a thing of stone," is one of the most effective solos in the work. Charon being ultimately induced to convey Orpheus over the river, the scene closes with a chorus descriptive of their passage. In Scene II., after an Interlude constructed mainly on the Orpheus motive, a very charming contralto solo and semi-chorus (soprani and alti), "At rest, at peace," representing the reflections of those in Erebus, is contrasted with a baritone solo and semi-chorus (tenori and bassi) as from Tartarus, "Woe! unutterable woe!" Here we have most effective music and delicate and forcible orchestration somewhat Wagnerian, difficult perhaps, but well repaying the trouble of careful preparation. Eurydice is now heard in the scene "I stand between two awful worlds," and the Eurydice theme is first heard. Of this as well as of the Orpheus motive, on his approaching, there is skilful and artistic handling. Eurydice's music, as she defies the gods and hears Orpheus approaching, and that in the meeting and the duet "There is no night of death if thou art there," with which the scene closes, is dramatic to a high degree.

The chorus "Along the fearful road," quite suggestive enough of Dvorák, opens Scene III. The voices of Orpheus and Eurydice are heard in short passages, alternating with the choruses descriptive of the various ordeals through which he leads her. The music is amply suggestive as they pass through the Realms of Fire and Water into that of Spirits. At this point use is made of reiterated chords on the strings, played col legno, and the chorus "Come, dead men, round her dance," is well written. At Orpheus's fatal violation of his contract with Pluto, in turning to her aid, Eurydice's "Farewell" is heard fainter and fainter as she disappears; though in this performance the greatest possible effect was hardly attained here. An expressive duet, in canon, for contralto and baritone, "Weep for the love," leads into the final chorus, "Lonely on earth," in which the Orpheus theme is made considerable use of by augmentation. The soprano was Miss Emily Davies (who claimed special indulgence by reason of a cold); the tenor, Mr. Iver McKay; Miss Emily Dones sang the contralto and Mr. T. Lynes gave an excellent rendering of the bass parts. On the whole, the performance was an eminently satisfactory one, and Dr. Sawyer received a double recall.

THE LONDON BOARD SCHOOLS VOCAL MUSIC COMPETITION.

The fifth annual vocal music Competition for the challenge medallion offered to choirs in metropolitan elementary schools was successfully held in Exeter Hall on the 13th ult. Eight choirs had been selected at a series of local competitions for the honour of appearing at the final event. On this occasion some special prizes were offered. To the first choir Mr. Curwen gave a prize of books relating to music, and to the second choir Messrs. Novello and Co. gave a handsomely framed portrait of Handel. All the competing choirs were also presented with a picture bearing an inscription that it was a memorial of the occasion. Each choir had to sing:—

(b.) A three-part sight test to the Sol-fa syllables only.

(c.) A piece of its own selection.

The Judges were Sir John Stainer, Professor Bridge, and Mr. W. G. McNaught. Sir John Stainer stated, on behalf of himself and colleagues, that they had unanimously decided that the Haselrigge Road School must have the medallion, and that Lyndhurst Grove School must have the second prize; the Judges desired it to be understood that there was very little difference between these two choirs. The result was received with great applause. The prizes were then formally handed to the victors by Lady Stainer, who herself was presented with a handsome bouquet.

OBITUARY.

On the 9th ult. there passed away, at his residence near Windsor, Sir George Job Elvey, one of the most respected musicians of the present century. Born at Canterbury in 1816, George Elvey, like his brother Stephen, who was several years his senior, evinced at an early age a predilection for music, and after studying under Highmore Skeats, Organist of the Cathedral, and also under his brother, he went to the Royal Academy of Music, where he had for masters, Cipriani Potter and Dr. Crotch. His veneration for Crotch was very great, and the composer's Oratorio "Palestine" was frequently performed under Elvey's direction at Windsor. His connection with the Royal borough commenced in 1835, when he was appointed Organist and Master of the Boys at St. George's Chapel. It was a responsible position for one so young, but he at once proceeded to justify the selection by improving the music, which had fallen into a sad state of neglect; and under his direction the choir of St. George's became one of the most famous in the United Kingdom. He took the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford in 1838, and graduated Mus. Doc. two years later. One of his degree exercises—a short Oratorio, "The Resurrection and Ascension"—was performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society in December, 1840. He wrote another Oratorio, "Mount Carmel," containing some excellent music, but the subject is unfortunately the same as Mendelssohn's immortal "Elijah." But it was as a writer of church music that he most excelled. Many of his anthems, such as "I beheld, and lo!" "In that day," "Wherewithal shall a young man," "When Israel came out of Egypt," "Arise, shine!" "And it was the third hour," and "Unto Thee," are extremely effective, and the last-named is a really beautiful composition. From his position in Windsor Castle, Elvey was called upon to take part in many Royal christenings, confirmations, weddings, and funerals, and much of his music owes its origin to these events. As an accompanist on the organ he was without a rival, but he was singularly conservative in his views, and until his retirement, in 1882, the beautiful instrument in St. George's had unequal temperament and F manuals and pedal-board. For modern music he had no sympathy—Handel being his favourite composer. In 1871 he was knighted by the Queen. Sir George Elvey was married no fewer than four times, and leaves a widow. Many of his pupils have attained excellent positions in the musical world, and there was a considerable muster of "old boys" at the funeral on the 14th ult., which was a very impressive service.

We regret to announce, also, the following deaths:—

William Chalmers Masters, on November 28, at Southsea, aged seventy-three; teacher, and composer of songs, two operettas, "The Forester's Daughter" and "The Rose of Salency," and other vocal works.

Rudolf von Hertzberg, for many years Conductor of the famous Berlin Dome Choir, a pupil of L. Berger and S. Dehn. He died on November 22, at Berlin, aged seventy-five.

Robert Julien van Maldeghem, on November 13, at Brussels, aged eighty-three. Born in 1810, he became a pupil of Fétis, gained the Grand Prix de Rome at the Brussels Conservatoire in 1838, became well known as organist, composer, and editor of a musical paper, the Cecilia, for which he wrote masses, motets, organ fugues, &c. He rendered great service to Art by editing for thirty years his "Trésor musical," in which appeared numerous previously neglected compositions by the old masters of the Netherlandish and Flemish Schools, such as Josquin des Prés, Orlando di Lasso, and others.

Carl Kossmaly, composer, conductor, and musical littérateur, at Stettin, aged eighty-one. In 1846 he published a biographical dictionary of musicians. He was a staunch opponent of Wagner and the whole modern school.

Dr. Edward Frank, composer and pianist of considerable reputation in Berlin, where he died on the 1st ult., aged seventy-six.

Emil Börngen, on the 2nd ult., aged forty-eight; for several years chief professor of the violoncello and librarian at the Royal School of Music, Würzburg.

Josef Böhm, President of the Vienna Ambrosius Society for the cultivation of classical church music, formerly choir director at the Stadtpfarrkirche, Am Hof, Vienna, in which town he died on November 6, aged fifty-two.

Dr. W. Massmann, at Wismar, on November 29, aged ninety-one. He was one of the original members of the famous Leipzig "Pauliner" Church Choir, which was founded on July 4, 1822, by sixteen students at the University.

Karl, Freiherr von Sterneck, founder, and for many years president, of the Mozarteum, Salzburg, where he died, aged seventy-nine.

Franz Mair, the founder and for many years Conductor of the Vienna "Schubert-Bund" male-voice choir, on November 30, aged seventy-three. He composed over 100 male-voice choruses, numerous songs, masses, and large works for chorus and orchestra.

Giuseppe de Angelis, excellent horn virtuoso, at Naples, aged fifty-two.

Oscar Schmidt, talented composer of numerous works, a well-known figure in musical circles in Brussels, in which town he died, on the 15th ult., aged sixty-one.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The most important musical event of the past month has been Mr. Stockley's second Concert of the season. This is Mr. Stockley's twentieth series, and to his untiring efforts are due both the training of an admirable orchestra and the gradual culture of a special public such as alone can appreciate and enjoy orchestral works of the higher order. On this occasion Professor Stanford's "Irish" Symphony was produced—or, rather, reproduced—since it was first given at these Concerts some two or three years ago as the pièce de resistance of the evening. Dr. Stanford's music is not, as a rule, permitting of complete exhaustion upon a first hearing, consequently this second presentation of a work exacting both upon players and audience was highly welcomed. The composer has made ingenious use of one or two phrases from old Irish songs to furnish his Leitmotiven; not a little of the melodic interest of the work depends upon the skilful adaptation of these reminiscences. As for the orchestration and thematic development generally, the masterly hand is shown therein. The work on the whole is, indeed, perfectly balanced and clear, spite of its extreme complexity. The composer (who conducted in person) received the usual ovation at the close. Another very interesting production was the Overture to "Cleopatra," by the Italian composer Mancinelli. This work, owing to its melodic charm and bright orchestration, made a very great impression. The vocalist on this occasion was Mr. Plunket Greene; as solo pianist Miss Fanny Davies produced Chopin's Concerto in F minor.

The Festival Choral Society gave a revival of "Judith" (Dr. Hubert H. Parry) at the second Concert of this Society's subscription series. This is a work which, magnificent truly in its choral writing, is eminently fitted to display the merits of our Birmingham choristers. One of our local critics waxes most enthusiastic over this work, predicting for it a lasting fame in company with the "Elijah." It cannot be gainsaid, however, that our musical public in general preserves, at least, a cooler judgment, while not deficient in admiring appreciation of the high artistic excellencies of Dr. Parry's chef d'œuvre—unless, indeed, that term must, as some think, be applied rather to the composer's later work, "Job." To our mind—apart from any criticism of the music per se—"Judith" will suffer, if at all, rather from a certain fault in the subject-matter itself. It is, for instance, hardly "sacred" enough in theme to satisfy the requirements of an Oratorio public, whose ideals are "The Messiah" and the "Elijah." The "action," so to call it, though highly dramatic, is of a bellicose, secular sort, while the heroine of the "book," though imposing and noble, fails to excite any other feeling than that of admiration, mingled, perhaps, with a little repulsion. But "Judith" must take her chance with all other Apocryphal heroes and heroines; certainly, if a clever treatment of her sanguinary story in music can keep her fame alive, or further embellish and illustrate it, this will be done—and, as we conceive, never possibly better—in Dr. Parry's most masterly composition.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the past month the principal item of interest in the musical world here has been the performance of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's delightful work "The Dream of Jubal," by the Philharmonic Society, in the Ulster Hall, on November 28. The building was crowded to its utmost capacity by a critical audience, and the performance was one which reflected the greatest possible credit on the Society and its talented Conductor, Mr. F. Koeller. The vocalists engaged for the performance of the work were Miss Lucille Hill and Mr. Rhys Thomas. The lady was indisposed, owing to a rough sea passage, but the tenor—a member of the Carl Rosa Company—displayed a remarkably fine voice, and did full justice to the beauties of the music. Mr. Charles Fry was specially engaged to deliver the beautiful poem of Mr. Joseph Bennett—which forms the backbone of the composition. The Committee were fortunate in securing this gentleman's services, and it is beyond question that a very favourable impression was created on the audience. The press also was unanimous in praise. The remainder of the programme consisted of Dr. C. V. Stanford's "Battle of the Baltic" (beautifully rendered) and a miscellaneous programme.

On the 1st ult. Dr. Collisson gave the fourth Concert of his Subscription Series in the Ulster Hall, assisted by Madame Alice Gomez, Miss Rosa Leo, and Mr. Holman Black as the vocalists, with Miss Kate Chaplin (solo violin) and Miss Mabel Chaplin (solo violoncello) as instrumentalists.

During the week beginning the 4th ult. our local Operatic Society gave seven performances of Lecocq's "La fille de Madame Angot," in the Theatre Royal, under the conductorship of Mr. Louis Mantell, assisted by Mr. G. C. Ferguson, deputy-Conductor. The principal parts were filled with the greatest ability and received with very hearty applause, Mrs. Louis Mantell, who undertook Clairette, being especially happy in the part. As an instance of the enthusiasm excited, it may be mentioned that this lady's song in the last Act received the unusual compliment of five encores. Mr. Louis Mantell and Mr. Edwin Rennie divided the rôle of Ange Pitou. Madame Ryan sang and acted charmingly as Mdlle. Lange, Mr. James Campbell was a splendid Pomponnet, and the other characters were all efficiently filled.

On the 15th and 16th ult. the Philharmonic Society gave two performances of "The Messiah" in the Ulster Hall, both of which were crowded to excess. The artists engaged were Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Lily Moody, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Charles Manners. Mr. F. Koeller conducted with his usual ability.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At the 99th popular Concert given by the Bristol Musical Association, on November 25, the choir sang Barnby's "Awake! Æolian lyre," Bishop's "Chough and crow" and "Now tramp," Mendelssohn's "The Lark's Song" and "A Hunting Song," and the Soldiers' Chorus from Gounod's "Faust" with commendable precision and effect. Mr. Howard Reynolds, the cornet player, proved an attraction to the popular assemblage; Miss Marianne Eissler contributed violin solos, and Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss Beresford Joy, and Mr. Edward Branscombe sang songs.

The 100th Concert took place on the 16th ult., and proved a great success. The contributions of the choir were Bishop's "Hark! Apollo strikes the lyre," the Benedictus from Mozart's "Requiem," Faning's "The Song of the Vikings," Bishop's "What phrase, sad and soft," Pinsuti's "Good night, beloved," and Martin's "Sweet minstrel of the woods." Madame Gomez, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Montague Worlock contributed songs, Mr. Riseley gave an organ solo, Mr. Geo. Harlow a cornet solo, Miss Mary George and Miss Buist harp pieces, Master Toy violin solos, and the band performed a couple of overtures.

On the 18th ult. Mr. Krauss, the hon. treasurer of the Bristol Musical Association, invited the members of the choir and band to a Conversazione in celebration of the giving of the century Concert. The opportunity was embraced of presenting Mr. Krauss with an illuminated address in recognition of his having filled the office of treasurer from the foundation of the Association.

A capital performance of Barnett's "Building of the Ship" was given, on the 14th ult., by the choir of Mr. John Barrett, in whose absence, through indisposition, Mr. George Riseley conducted. The choruses were all given with the precision, spirit, and finish which always mark the singing of this choral body. The solos were well delivered by Miss Susan Harrhy (Cheltenham), Miss Clara Aldersley, Miss Jennie Dutton, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Thomas. Mrs. Brockbank Young was an admirable accompanist. Miscellaneous pieces comprised the second part of the programme, including a part-song, "The wind and the ocean," by J. L. Roeckel, to words supplied by Shapcott Wensley, composed expressly for and dedicated to the choir. The piece, given under the direction of the author, was well sung and warmly received by the audience.

Bishopston Church Choral Society gave a Concert on the 7th ult., when a number of glees and part-songs were rendered, under the direction of Mr. W. E. B. Westcott, and members contributed songs.

The Christ Church (Clifton) Choral Society, at its annual Concert, on the 6th ult., gave a creditable performance of Gaul's "Ruth," under the direction of Mr. John Barrett, the solos being taken by Miss Fanny Evans, Miss Clara Aldersley, Miss Jennie Dutton, Mr. Allan Hayes, and Mr. R. McGregor. The second part of the programme contained miscellaneous pieces.

A remarkably fine performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given in Colston Hall, on the 20th ult., by the Bristol Choral Society, the forces numbering 600. A long time had been spent in rehearsing the Oratorio and in polishing up points in the grand chain of choruses, hence the work was publicly unfolded with magnificent results. Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Dan Price were the principal vocalists, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.

On November 28 a Conversazione of musical societies in Bristol took place in Colston Hall. The idea of bringing together in this way the various choral bodies originated with Canon Tetley and Mr. P. Napier Miles, cultured amateurs, who desired to strengthen amicable feelings between musical folk, hence it is a matter of regret that some of the societies did not see their way to accept invitations sent them. Nevertheless the gathering was large and enjoyable. Brief speeches were delivered by the Sheriff, the Dean of Bristol, Mr. H. C. Banister (on a short visit to the city), Canon Tetley, and Mr. P. Napier Miles. Under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, the Bristol Choral Society sang the Hallelujah Chorus from Handel's "Messiah," the Society of Instrumentalists played the Andante and Finale from Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, and the Orpheus Glee Society contributed several familiar glees and part-songs. Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Aldersley, and Mr. W. Thomas rendered songs, and Mr. Carrington played a violin solo.

The members of the Western Section of the Incorporated Society of Professional Musicians held their annual meetings on November 29. In the afternoon, Mr. H. C. Banister delivered a most instructive Lecture on "Some thoughts concerning Musical Composition." The annual banquet was held in the evening at the Imperial Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. E. A. Harvey, who was supported by Mr. Banister and a number of local musicians and friends. The brief speeches delivered were chiefly of a complimentary nature. After the repast a short musical programme was given.

Musical competitions in connection with the Bristol Industrial and Fine Arts Exhibition took place during the week ending the 2nd ult. Contests for prizes offered for pianoforte playing drew sixty-three competitors. Messrs. J. L. Roeckel and George Riseley were the adjudicators. In the senior pianoforte competition the chief prizes were won by Miss Ethel Goold, of Bath, the other prize-takers being Miss M. Glass, Miss Rose Thomas, Miss A. M. Coates, Miss G. M. Barnes, and Mrs. Mendham, all of Bristol. In the junior competition the prize-winners were Master H. A. Darbey, Miss A. C. Brooks, Miss Alice Krauss, Miss E. M. Bennett, of Bristol, and "Agnes Zimmermann," of Maesteg. The Llanelly Town Band carried off the chief honours in the brass band contests, and the other prizes went principally to local bands. Mr. George Riseley and Mr. J. Sommer, Chatham, were the adjudicators.

The musical Recitals in Bristol Cathedral having lapsed, owing to inadequate support on the part of the public, the Rev. Canon Cornish and Mr. J. W. Lawson have revived special musical services in Redcliffe Church, where they were established many years ago. The second service of the season took place on the 12th ult., Spohr's "Last Judgment" being then given with orchestral accompaniment, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Lawson.

On the 13th ult. the same work was done in St. John's Church, Redland, with the aid of a band, Mr. A. E. Hill conducting.

Mr. Paderewski gave a Pianoforte Recital to a crowded assemblage at Colston Hall, on the 1st ult., and Mr. Sarasate a Violin Recital on the 12th ult.

Mrs. W. Weaver, Directress of the Bristol and Clifton Training School of Music, delivered a Lecture on "The Romance of Music and Musicians during the last two Centuries," at Redland, on the 5th ult.

The Rev. R. O. Hutchinson lectured on Wagner's "Tannhäuser," at All Saints' Hall, Clifton, on the 7th ult.

The Bristol Post Office Band Concert, on the 7th ult., was a success. Songs were sung by Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Lily Moody, and Mr. Charles Manners; the band played popular pieces, and Mr. George Riseley performed organ solos.

Messrs. Harrison's third Subscription Concert took place on the 11th ult. Madame Albani, who was prevented by illness from taking part in the previous Concert on November 21, was the principal vocalist, and sang the pieces formerly set down for her.

A number of School Concerts were given the week before Christmas.

Carol singing was general in the places of worship in Bristol at Christmas, the pieces being chiefly drawn from the useful books published by Messrs. Novello.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

Berlioz's "Faust" was the work chosen by the Dublin Musical Society for its first Concert for the season, which took place on November 29, in the Examination Hall of the Royal University, Earlsfort Terrace. The attendance was large, but not so large as might have been expected from the interest of such a production. Berlioz's work is new to Dublin, save for one performance by the same Society in 1890, when it was one of the novelties pressed on the Committee by the then newly-appointed Conductor, Dr. Joseph Smith. Comparing its production on that occasion with the performance of last November, it is impossible to ignore the great strides made by the Society's choir and band during the last few years in coping with the difficulties of compositions in the advanced style.

The beauties of the "Easter Hymn" were greatly appreciated, and hearty applause greeted the conclusion of this number. The superior tone of the male voices in the Soldiers' and Students' choruses was also noticeable. The band scored a popular success in the Hungarian March, which was re-demanded but not repeated; and the "Dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps" was played with great taste and precision, as were also the accompaniments to the "Serenade," the "Invocation of Nature," and the "Ride to the abyss." The principal solo parts were sung effectively by Miss Medora Henson (who replaced Miss Lucille Hill), Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, whose rendering of the "Serenade" so pleased the audience that he was obliged to repeat it. The choir numbered 350 voices. The band was led by Mr. Th. Werner, Mr. Horan, sen., presided at the organ, and Dr. Joseph Smith conducted.

The annual series of Chamber Music Recitals under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society commenced on November 20, at Leinster House, when Schumann's String Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 5), Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 24) for pianoforte and violin, and Brahms's Quartet in G minor (Op. 25) for pianoforte and strings were performed before a large and cultivated audience. The same programme was repeated on November 27. On the 4th ult. Haydn's String Quartet (Op. 76, No. 2), Rubinstein's Sonata in A minor (Op. 19) for pianoforte and violin, and Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 87) for pianoforte and strings made up the programme, the locale being changed to the Large Hall of the Royal University, where the Recitals will continue to be held until the completion of the Royal Dublin Society's Theatre. The executants are Signor Papini and Mr. P. Delaney, violins; Mr. Grisard, viola; Mr. Bast, violoncello; and Signor Esposito, pianoforte.

Dr. W. H. Collisson's Popular Concerts at the Leinster Hall were continued on November 4 and the 2nd ult., his principal engagements being Madame Albani and Miss Alice Gomez.

A series of twelve Violin Recitals, by Herr Th. Werner, commenced at the Molesworth Hall on November 14. The six programmes announced a most exhaustive répertoire, giving examples of well-nigh every notable composer for the violin, from Handel and Bach to Sarasate and Saint-Saëns.

Two Pianoforte Recitals by Paderewski took place in the Leinster Hall on November 9 and 11. Quite a keen competition arose for places to see and hear the renowned pianist on his first appearance in Dublin. Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, Rubinstein, and Paderewski were represented on the programmes, and were interpreted by the virtuoso in a fashion that promptly established for him in Dublin the prestige he enjoys everywhere he has been heard.

At the Antient Concert Rooms Mrs. Scott-Ffennell's annual benefit Concert took place on November 25, when she had the co-operation of Mr. Plunket Greene, Signors Papini and Esposito, and others. Dr. Collisson conducted.

Miss Croft and Mrs. Ward-Moriarty held their benefit Concerts in the same hall on November 16 and the 6th ult., the Conductors being Mr. Kendal Irwin and Mr. Monypeny respectively.

Two Opera Concerts were given by Mr. Mapleson in the Leinster Hall, on the 4th and 11th ult., with Madame Dotti and a party of vocalists and instrumental soloists.

A very successful Extra Concert was given by the Dublin Musical Society on the 20th ult., when Handel's "Messiah" was performed, with Mrs. Fanny Moody, Mrs. J. Rosse, Mr. Evan Cox, and Mr. Charles Manners as principal vocalists.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A magnificent rendering of Berlioz's "Faust," in which the Edinburgh Choral Union was rather overweighted, drew a very large audience on the 4th ult., and the second Saturday Evening Concert at popular prices was ample evidence that the Scottish Orchestra is now well established. The hall was very full, and a far from so-called "popular" programme was enthusiastically received. The success attained by Mr. Henschel's forces in the C minor Symphony secured a double recall for the Conductor, and a few ultra-enthusiastic members of the audience were so delighted that they actually proposed to encore the performance!

On Tuesday, the 12th ult., the rival scheme made a worthy bid for popular support. Mr. Manns, at the head of a larger body of instrumentalists, was warmly received by his friends, and an interesting programme was submitted. Edinburgh should profit by the opportunities of comparison and correction; but a more thorough system of advertisement would largely improve the Glasgow Choral Union's chances of success.

Mr. Sarasate, assisted by Madame Berthe Marx, gave his annual Recital in the Music Hall, before an audience affected in numbers by the great artist's appearance the same week in the second of Messrs. Paterson's Orchestral Concerts. Dvorák's Slavonic Dances (Op. 72) and his own "Faust" Fantaisie were the most noteworthy contributions by the Concert-giver, and Madame Marx was heard with great pleasure in a Chopin Scherzo and a modernised Scarlatti Sonata. Encores were the order of the afternoon; even Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia was re-demanded.

Mr. Henschel gave us one of the most enjoyable Concerts the season is likely to offer, on the 1st ult., in the Music Hall, when, under the auspices of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, he gave a Vocal Recital, assisted by Mrs. Henschel. The great success of a similar venture last year attracted a very large audience, and no one was disappointed. Mrs. Henschel in "Nymphs and Shepherds" and in her husband's charming Cradle Song (encored) was most successful, and Mr. Henschel's best

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Following those attractive extra numbers of The Musical Times that are devoted to Beethoven and Mozart respectively, there has just been issued a number dedicated to memorials of Handel, beginning with a eulogy in Mr. Joseph Bennett's most admired style. . . . is filled with matter of great interest. Sir Walter Parratt and Dr. A. H. Mann write on the autographs at Buckingham Palace and in the Fitzwilliam Museum respectively; the complete text of the composer's will, with its four codicils, is given; Mr. W. H. Cummings describes the admirable set of illustrations, which include a number of portraits, and several interesting fac-similes; Mr. Hipkins gives the details of the master's harpsichords; and John Christopher Smith's well-known personal description is given, reprinted. The Queen has permitted Hudson's portrait, a page of the score of 'Jephtha,' and a signature to be reproduced, and a fac-simile is also given of the wonderfully-interesting page from the Fitzwilliam sketch-books, containing the first idea of 'He was despised' and the 'Amen' chorus, as well as a tune called 'Der arme Irische Junger.'"—The Times.

"The handsome 'Handel' supplement of The Musical Times, which Messrs. Novello issued to-day, will certainly prove of great interest to amateurs."—Daily News.

". . . The number, in the preparation of which valuable aid has been received from Mr. W. H. Cummings, is handsomely illustrated with a profusion of admirably-executed portraits, caricatures, and fac-similes."—Daily Graphic.

". . . is full of good things. It does the utmost credit to its compilers, and is worth a good deal more than the sixpence that is asked for it."—Sunday Times.

". . . is not only readable, but valuable."—Athenæum.

". . . There is an interesting preface by Mr. Bennett, and an article upon the Handel autographs at Buckingham Palace. . . . Praise is due to Messrs. Novello for publishing this interesting work at a price which puts it within reach of the poorest student."—The Observer.

"Following upon the 'Mozart Centenary' and the 'Beethoven' special numbers of The Musical Times, has just appeared the 'Handel' number, containing special articles upon the most popular of all composers in this country, numerous portraits, fac-similes, and general matters related to the great Anglo-Saxon giant."—Weekly Dispatch.

". . . An admirable series of remarks on Handel and his genius, adorned with twelve excellent likenesses of the great musician, copied from original portraits."—The People.

". . . Is full of interest to those who reverence the genius, and love the music of the great Anglo-Saxon composer; all of these persons will doubtless hasten to possess a copy of the issue. Among the many portraits given of the master, that engraved from the picture by Hudson, in possession of Mr. W. H. Cummings, is certainly the finest, and a beautiful piece of engraving it is. . . . The production and printing of this most interesting brochure reflect the greatest credit on the house of Messrs. Novello."—Musical News.

". . . Is full of valuable matter connected with the great composer's history."—Dundee Advertiser.

". . . Contains several most interesting articles on the great master. . . . also many portraits and interesting fac-similes, her Majesty the Queen having graciously granted the reproduction of the portrait of Handel by Hudson, the autograph of the final page of the oratorio 'Jephtha,' and his signature. . . . The number is readable and very valuable, and will, no doubt, find its way into the hands of all musicians."—Irish Times.

". . . Especially appropriate to the season, when so many musical societies are giving performances of his most popular work 'The Messiah.' . . . The number is rich in illustrations, chiefly portraits, besides fac-similes of his handwriting and composition, permission to reproduce some having been specially accorded by the Queen."—Liverpool Courier.

". . . Contains some excellent new contributions to the literature of the Saxon composer's life. Sir Walter Parratt's article on the Handel autograph scores at Buckingham Palace, Dr. A. H. Mann's on the Fitzwilliam manuscripts, and that of Mr. A. J. Hipkins on the congenial and familiar subject of the Handel harpsichords are peculiarly interesting and instructive. Like the Mozart and Beethoven numbers previously published, the 'Handel Supplement' is well furnished with pictures, portraits, letters, and fac-similes."—Manchester Guardian.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

efforts were "Ich grolle nicht" and a very old song by Franck. The ensemble of two such accomplished artists in selections from Méhul's "Joseph" and Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" was perfect.

It is difficult to over-estimate the artistic importance of Mr. Paderewski's double appearance—in October and on the 5th ult. Both programmes were admirably calculated to display the great player's wonderful versatility, and in Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, and Liszt he delighted and refreshed even more than he astonished, and nothing more could be said. His Chopin proved, as usual, a rare artistic performance, and it is an inadequate testimony to the artist when we find no musical event in Edinburgh to compare with his Recitals since Rubinstein gave his last Concert here. Both Recitals attracted overflowing audiences.

A most interesting series of historical Concerts has been organised by Professor Niecks in the Music Class-Room of the University. The subject is "Dramatic Music," and the two Concerts already given have dealt with the earliest operas and with the Italian opera of the eighteenth century. Admirably chosen and arranged programmes illustrate the various periods of development.

In Perth a new departure was made in music by Mr. Graves's Amateur Opera Company, which gave, in the City Hall, a performance of "H.M.S. Pinafore" in aid of the National Lifeboat Institution. The various parts were excellently sustained, and the complete success of the first undertaking should ensure others to follow. The choruses were admirably rendered by members of Miss Steele's Select Choir and friends.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ONE prominent feature marked the Scottish Orchestra Company's "Popular" Coucert on the evening of the 2nd ult. This was the appearance of Mrs. Henschel, who sang with all her wonted charm, and who, moreover, brought down the house (to use a colloquialism)—a fitting compliment, it will be readily acknowledged, to an accomplished artist. The orchestral numbers in the programme included a Haydn Symphony, a superb performance of the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and selections from Beethoven's "Egmont" music. At the fourth classical Concert of the series (11th ult.) Liszt's Symphonic Poem (No. 1) was accorded a hearing, but, notwithstanding a fine interpretation of the somewhat bizarre work, it was received by the audience with remarkable apathy. Mr. Henschel was followed to far more satisfactory purpose in his fine exposition of the Overture to "Egmont," and the band was also decidedly good in Dvorák's Violin Concerto (Op. 53), wherein Mr. Maurice Sons, the soloist, once more fully met requirements which few players would care to face. Mr. Plunket Greene, the vocalist of the evening, acquitted himself admirably, as usual. The Concert on the 13th ult. brought forward selections from Mr. Henschel's interesting music to "Hamlet," Brahms's Symphony (No. 2) was heard for the second time this season, and Miss Evangeline Florence sang. For Christmas day a programme appropriate to the occasion, and with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel as vocalists, was announced.

Mr. August Manns and his orchestra of ninety performers made their first appearance for the season on the evening of the 14th ult., when the Sydenham chef was received with marked cordiality. The heartiness of the greeting served without a doubt to emphasise the fact that not only had Mr. Manns succeeded in establishing the Glasgow Choral Union Orchestral Concerts on a permanent basis, but that this was his fifteenth successive season as Conductor. The programme was culled from Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz, and Sullivan, the Bonn master being represented by his Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (No. 4). This was, of course, Mr. Frederic Lamond's great chance, and the young Glasgow pianist, fresh from his recent Continental successes, fairly rose to the occasion. There were also excellent performances of Wagner's Study to "Tristan und Isolde" and the orchestral version of the "Nachtgesang" from the same work. A first hearing of this season's orchestra goes to show that an unusually fine band has been brought North, strong in the violins, and numbering several accomplished performers at the wood-wind desks. Earlier press arrangements than usual, in connection with the Christmas holidays, permit us only to note that Sullivan's "The Golden Legend" and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's setting of "Lord Ullin's Daughter" (dedicated to the Choral Union) were announced for the 19th ult. Mr. William Wallace's Symphonic Prelude to "The Eumenides of Æschylus," a Haydn Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (for Mr. Elkan Kosman) were promised for the evening of the 26th ult.

The most notable of last month's miscellaneous Concerts was the Pianoforte Recital given by Mr. Paderewski. It was his third appearance in Glasgow this season, and, needless to say, a crowded audience was again drawn to St. Andrew's Hall. The Chamber Concert, on the 7th ult., under the auspices of the Scottish Orchestra Company, failed once more to arouse interest; and this was all the more remarkable as it introduced Mr. Henschel in his capacity as a pianist. He lent his valued aid in Beethoven's Quintet in E flat, and was ably supported by his coadjutors. Much excellent music was discoursed by the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club at the annual function known as the "Ladies' Night," and, as usual, the singing was of a cultured order, thanks to the high musical intelligence of this interesting body of vocalists and to the unfailing skill of their Conductor, Mr. Allan W. Young.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

TWO Concerts have been given by the Philharmonic Society during the past month. The first of these affords no scope for comment, the programme being of that conventional miscellaneous order which has obtained popularity among the subscribers of the premier Society. On the 19th ult. Handel's "Messiah" was given according to what is now recognised as biennial custom, and naturally the familiar Oratorio might be expected to receive ample justice under the direction of Sir Charles Hallé. The chief feature of the second half-session is to be Liszt's "St. Elizabeth."

On the 12th ult. the Post Office Choral Society gave its first Concert of the present season in the Philharmonic Hall, under Mr. W. I. Argent, with an orchestra and chorus announced as 250 strong. MacCunn's "Bonny Kilmeny" formed the first part of the programme, and this early and tuneful work of the Scotch writer was very well rendered. The same Conductor directed a Concert in commemoration of the late Charles Gounod on the 18th ult. at Liscard, when the first solemn Mass ("St. Cecilia") was given, together with a number of lesser excerpts from the works of the same composer. The orchestra and chorus numbered 150 performers.

The Christmas performance of Handel's "Messiah" by the Musical Society, under Mr. D. O. Parry, proved this recently revived organisation to be capable of great things and it is to be hoped that the present management will find an outlet for its very commendable vigour, in the direction of introducing to this city some of the many fine works composed for festivals of recent date, and which, though familiar elsewhere, have been, up to the present, sealed books in Liverpool.

An attempt has been made to establish what is termed "The City Musical Society," and a meeting was called for a late date in November to consider the matter. Nothing has, however, since been announced respecting this new departure, of which Mr. E. Shore was announced as Secretary and Mr. W. S. Syrett, Conductor.

The usual Advent performance of Oratorio at the Pro-Cathedral, with Mr. F. H. Burstall as Conductor and Mr. Collins at the organ, took place on the 7th ult., Armes's "Hezekiah" being the work selected. The regular choir was augmented to eighty voices, and a highly creditable performance may be recorded. A novelty at this gathering was the production of a melodious Motet by the Cathedral organist, "Jesu, lover of my soul."

The Orchestral Society gave a Ladies' Concert in the Philharmonic Hall on the 16th ult., at which the programme was exclusively representative of English writers of the present century—a truly happy idea on the part of the promoter and conductor, Mr. A. E. Rodewald. On the 13th ult. the Societa Armonica gave its hundredth Concert and revived the programme of its initial performance on June 18, 1849. The present Conductor is Mr. W. Cafferata, who succeeded his late father a year or two ago. Prior to the appointment of the latter, Mr. T. Armstrong had held the bâton for many years. These three amateur gentlemen were in turn preceded by Mr. E. W. Thomas and Mr. C. B. Herrmann, and at the present date it is probable that few if any of the original members survive. At the Centennial Concert the leading pieces were Hummel's Overture in B flat (Op. 101), two movements from Beethoven's Second Symphony, and Auber's "Masaniello" and Romberg's "Don Mendoza" Overtures.

The competitions for Orchestral Scholarships, instituted by the Corporation at the Music School, took place on the 21st ult., before the directors of the Institution named and Mr. Crawley and Mr. Hewitt, the two latter gentlemen representing the municipal authorities.

In the locality, Handel's "Samson" has been given on the 12th and 13th ult. respectively at Warrington and Runcorn, by the united Musical Societies of the two towns named, under Mr. F. H. Crosley. At Chester, the excellent Schiever Quartet has been engaged by Dr. Bridge, but no sign of a choral Concert has as yet been put forth at this ancient city. At Birkenhead, the old-established Subscription Concerts of the ballad order are running their usual course. At Rock Ferry, Mr. Pemberton's Musical Society has given Handel's "Zadok the Priest" and Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri," with a small orchestra. At Walton, Handel's "Messiah" was performed on the 11th ult., by the local Society, under Mr. W. Lockier.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Concerning the annual cycle of performances of "The Messiah," little more than quotation of the principals engaged is needed. The Philharmonic Society led the way with Miss Palliser, Madame Belle Cole, Messrs. McKay and Foli, and a powerful and hearty choir under the direction of Mr. Lane. On the 16th ult. Mr. Barrett essayed his first rendering, with Mesdames Clara Samuell, Belle Cole, Messrs. Ben Davies and Andrew Black, and a mixed choir. On the 21st and 22nd Sir Charles Hallé gave his two interpretations, with the assistance of the Misses Anna Williams and Clara Butt, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley; and several smaller suburban societies have, with more or less completeness, engaged in the customary national celebration of Christmas. The Gentlemen's Concert Society has already afforded its subscribers Recitals by Miss Fanny Davies of a varied selection of pianoforte music; by Mr. and Mrs. Oudin of French songs and duets, of a calibre which need not move English vocal writers to despair; and some charming concerted instrumental music (including Beethoven's Septet), led by Mr. Willy Hess. Dr. Watson's Vocal Society has given the second Concert of its twenty-seventh season, with an interesting programme, including Hofmann's "Fair Melusina," and Dr. Bridge has been lecturing on English Operatic Music, from Shakespeare to Purcell.

I suppose it will be admitted that the English people know something of the necessary qualifications of an efficient choral writer, and would not be slow to welcome a new Oratorio of really sterling merit. Of Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," the melodic charm may be estimated after the simple statement that it was a positive relief when the listener could fasten upon a connected sequence of a few bars; and the contrapuntal, as well as the dramatic merits may be proved by reference to the final movement for three choirs, in which Angels, Mortals, and Demons ultimately join in the very same strain. We have plenty of young musicians who could produce something more resembling an Oratorio than either "Paradise Lost" or "The Tower of Babel." The instrumental movements of Beethoven's Choral Symphony revived the jaded faculties of the audience, and were splendidly played; but I have too great respect for the composer to listen ever again to the vocal climax. On the 14th ult. Sir Charles Hallé, in addition to a really capital rendering of the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, introduced here Mr. Leonard Borwick, who played the Concerto, No. 2 (G minor), of Saint-Saëns, and several smaller works, in a manner that merited and elicited the warmest enthusiasm of all hearers. More finished execution, varied expression, and calm, self-contained manner could not be imagined; and Mr. Borwick's Recital, announced at the Gentlemen's Concerts in the approaching spring, will certainly attract a crowd of musicians. An unfortunate misunderstanding marred the orchestral accompaniment to the song from Gluck's "Orphée"; but Mdlle. Landi avenged herself by her rendering of Saint-Saëns's "Printemps qui commence" ("Samson et Dalila"), wherein she suffered not passionate expression entirely to obliterate beauty of tone.

That the second of the Subscription Concerts of Messrs. Harrison (6th ult.) was largely attended, necessarily resulted from the wealth of talent announced. Madame Albani is almost as seldom heard here as Madame Patti (who preceded her at these Concerts), and is always welcome; as is, also, Miss Palliser, than whom we have no more promising young artist, if only her physical power may endure the strain of hard study and work. Not to specify all the pleasures of the evening, it would be unjust not to particularise Madame Belle Cole's singing of Schira's "Sognai"—certainly not the smallest.

Mr. Paderewski paid us a farewell visit on the 18th ult., and again excited the enthusiasm—not always judicious—of a large gathering of admirers of the modern school of pianoforte playing; but it is far more gratifying to note the increased attendance at the Concerts which Mr. Willy Hess is now giving. That chamber music will ever become so much the fashion as to render its production adequately remunerative I do not believe; but it is extremely desirable that students should have opportunities of becoming acquainted with its many masterpieces; and, at the present juncture, it is imperative that some effort should be made firmly to establish such artistic Recitals as Mr. Hess is prepared to give. At his second meeting—in the Concert Hall on the 18th—Brahms's Sextet (Op. 18) and Schubert's Posthumous Allegro in C minor, for strings, were excellently played; and Mr. Plunket Greene gave some German Lieder with acceptance and two English ditties to the delight of his hearers. But the supremacy of Beethoven remained undisturbed, and his Trio in D (Op. 70), sympathetically interpreted by Miss Olga Néruda, Mr. Hess, and Mr. Vieuxtemps, remained the chief charm of the evening.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Michaelmas Term that has just closed has not been signalised by any very important music, but there have been a certain amount of events that deserve notice. Indeed, a large number of well known artists have been heard, including Mesdames Antoinette Trebelli, Antoinette Sterling, Helen Trust, and Berthe Marx; and Messrs. Chilley, Santley, Sarasate, and the Meister Glee Singers.

Only one local society gave a performance during the Term—the Oxford Gleemen. Their Concert, on November 9, in the New Schools, was successful, but the audience would have liked to hear more of the Gleemen themselves. The Invitation Concert of the University Musical Union was given in the same place on November 21. The Schiever Quartet gave a very fine rendering of the great Beethoven Quartet in A minor (Op. 132), which was, however, far beyond the comprehension of the great bulk of the listeners; and Mr. Schiever and Mrs. Fletcher were very successful in Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in C minor.

Two of the Public Classical Concerts took place during the past Term. At the first, on October 26, Stanford's "Irish" Symphony was the chief attraction. It was conducted by the composer and well received. Fraülein Frida Scotta attempted Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with some success. At the second Concert (November 16) eight movements from Handel's "Water Music" were an acceptable revival, and Miss Adelina de Lara was admirable in Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto in E minor. The Sheldonian Theatre, in which these Concerts are given, has no means of artificial lighting, and the Concert ended in an attempt to play Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in the dark from memory, which resulted in absolute disaster.

An important change has taken place in the chief local Society—the Oxford Choral and Philharmonic—where Mr. F. Cunningham Woods has succeeded Dr. Roberts as Conductor. A testimonial has been presented by the members to Dr. Roberts, on his resignation, to mark their appreciation of his valuable services during several years.

Sir John Stainer's Terminal Lecture, on November 29, was distinguished by the research and interest that he always contrives to exhibit on these occasions. The subject was "Song and Dance," and a number of well-chosen illustrations were very tastefully rendered by the Professor's Choir, and an orchestra composed entirely of members of the University, a notable fact for those who care to reflect on its full significance. It should be added that the Coryphæus got nearer to his true functions on this occasion than he had ever been known to do before.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The doings of a busy month opened auspiciously on the 1st ult. with the production, in the Albert Hall, of Mr. Henry Coward's new cantata for ladies' voices, "The Fairy Mirror." The composer being a native of Sheffield, and this work being his first important composition since "The Story of Bethany," considerable interest centred in the performance. The cantata is founded upon the story of "Snowdrop and the Seven Dwarfs," the libretto being from the pen of Mr. F. H. Kirk. The composer has been happy in his treatment of the pretty story, and has seized many opportunities of demonstrating his talent for writing in the operatic style. An abundance of melody runs through the work, and every number bears evidence of scrupulous care and musicianly design. The performance of the cantata by a choir of 400 voices mainly drawn from the local schools was in all respects faultless, and the composer, who conducted, was the recipient of many flattering tokens of the approval with which the work was received by the crowded audience. A repetition of the performance on the following evening was attended with equally satisfactory results.

On the 4th ult. a Chamber Concert was given in the Albert Hall, at which Messrs. Hess, Briggs, Speelman, and Whitehouse played Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2), and, with Mr. E. P. Reynolds, Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat (Op. 44). Madame Agnes Larkcom and Mr. Santley were the vocalists, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers accompanied.

The Amateur Instrumental Society gave its first Concert on the 5th ult., playing in admirable style Raff's "Lenore" Symphony, a selection from "Rigoletto," and Overtures to "Lurline," "Die Zauberflöte," &c. The Symphony was new to Sheffield, and an exceptionally excellent performance of it was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. H. Coward conducted.

On the 7th ult. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" was performed by the Musical Union, under Mr. Coward. The work, which was first given here several years ago by the now disbanded Harmonic Society, is one which affords scope for excellent choral effects, and in this respect the members of the Musical Union covered themselves with credit. In delicacy and finish equally as in vigour and firmness of attack, the chorus singing left nothing to be desired. The soloists were successful and the orchestra, under the lead of Mr. J. A. Cox, played the intricate score excellently. Mr. W. S. Jessop was Organist.

The Brincliffe Orchestral Society gave a successful Concert on the 11th ult., under Mr. W. H. Peasegood, playing Haydn's No. 1 Symphony and other pieces.

The Amateur Musical Society gave the usual Winter Concert on the 15th ult., the work performed being "Elijah." The Oratorio was given a few years ago by the same Society, but the repetition argues no lack of enterprise on the part of the committee. On the contrary, it is to this progressive Society that local music-lovers look for the introduction to the city of successful Festival novelties. There was, however, a general wish among the subscribers to hear "Elijah," and the brilliant result justified the choice. The work was performed in irreproachable style, the chief honours being won by the chorus. Never have the members done better work, and this excellence was maintained throughout. The principals were Miss Medora Henson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Philips was Organist, and Mr. Schollhammer conducted.

On the 18th ult. Mr. Paderewski gave his first Recital in the Albert Hall. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

Among other Concerts given during the month were the Young Men's Christian Association's Ballad Concert, at which the Meister Glee Singers appeared, and the last of the Subscription Orchestral Concerts, at which Madame Belle Cole and Mr. W. H. Brereton sang and Mr. Arbos played.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society performed "Elijah" in the Harvey Institute on the 14th ult. The band and chorus, numbering 150, were excellent, and the principals sustained the solos with complete success. Mr. A. Benton, of Leeds, conducted.

The usual number of "Messiah" performances were announced for Christmas Day.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On November 29 a Concert of chamber music was given by the four gentlemen who style themselves "The Leeds String Quartet," Messrs. Müller, Fawcett, Gutfeld, and Giessing. The programme included Beethoven's Quartet in F minor (Op. 95), Mozart's Quartet in D minor, and movements by Tschaikowsky and Mendelssohn. Miss Fanny Newveld was the vocalist. Chamber music of the highest class is by no means so frequently to be heard in Leeds that such unpretending but artistic and eminently educational Concerts as this can be dispensed with. On the 5th ult. Mr. Edgar Haddock gave one of his popular Musical Evenings. Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 66) were the chief things in the programme, and were ably played by the Concert-giver, Mr. Krause, and Mr. de Munck, with Miss Adeline de Lara as pianist. Miss de Lara's brilliant pianoforte playing met with the warm approval of the audience, as did the singing of Madame Duma and Mr. H. Chilver Wilson. On the 11th ult. the Leeds Symphony Society, an amateur Institution, acquitted itself with credit in a programme of more than usual interest. A Haydn Symphony, the "Prometheus" and "Peter Schmoll" Overtures, and a selection of Ballet Music from Gluck's operas were among the more striking features of the programme. Two old English melodies, tastefully arranged for strings by Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, a local musician, also call for especial notice. Mr. J. L. Hebblethwaite, a promising baritone, was the vocalist, and Mr. Gutfeld conducted the performance. The second of the Leeds Subscription Concerts, on the 13th ult., consisted of a Pianoforte Recital by Mr. Paderewski, who attracted so large an audience to the Town Hall as to inspire the Committee with unwonted confidence as to the financial result of the season.

At Bradford, two Subscription Concerts have been given since our last despatch. On November 24 a programme of chamber music, the chief features of which were Beethoven's Septet and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A (Op. 81), was submitted to a crowded audience. The executants were Miss Wietrowetz and Mr. Risegari (violins), Messrs. Speelman (viola), Klengel (violoncello), Hoffmann (clarinet), Paersch (horn), Lalande (bassoon), J. Hoffmann (double-bass), and Miss Fanny Davies (pianoforte). It cannot be said that the ensemble was worthy of such eminent artists as these, but the excellent viola playing of Mr. Speelman and Mr. Paersch's perfect performance of the horn part in the Septet call for the warmest praise. Miss Agnes Janson was the vocalist.

On the 15th ult. the programme consisted of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony, followed by Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," a somewhat singular selection, and not by any means too favourable to the English composer. The soloists were Miss Fillunger, Madame Marian McKenzie, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Bantock Pierpoint, and W. Thornton. Sir Charles Hallé's band was at its best in the Scherzo of the Symphony, the performance of which, as a whole, was thoroughly adequate, if not brilliant. In Sullivan's music the chorus sang finely, and Mr. Lloyd magnificently, but it cannot be said that the work made any very deep or lasting impression, or that it gains much upon a closer acquaintance. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra gave the third of its Saturday Evening Concerts on the 9th ult. Liszt's E flat Pianoforte Concerto, brilliantly played by Mr. Fred. Dawson, was the most important work performed, and the programme included also the Prelude and Introduction to the third act from "Lohengrin" and the "Guillaume Tell" Overture. Miss Annie Holden and Mr. R. Browning were the vocalists, and Mr. W. B. Sewell the Conductor.

At Huddersfield the Glee and Madrigal Society, of which Mr. Ramsay Bower is the Conductor, announced a programme of Mendelssohn's music for the 5th ult., and on the 12th ult. an interesting and, in the higher sense of the word, popular programme of orchestral music was afforded at the sixth of the Subscription Concerts. Mozart's E flat Symphony, together with such favourite Overtures as "Leonora," "Freischütz," "Guillaume Tell," and "Tannhäuser" were well calculated to show off Sir Charles Hallé's famous band to the utmost advantage. Mr. Willy Hess played Dr. Mackenzie's fine "Pibroch" with breadth and mastery, and Miss Medora Henson proved exactly the correct type of vocalist for an orchestral Concert. Sir Charles Hallé conducted.

The Dewsbury Choral Society, under the honorary conductorship of Mr. G. H. Hirst, gave, on November 28, a highly interesting Concert. Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" occupied the first portion of the programme, and was well rendered, in spite of the absence of two of the principal vocalists and the substitution of others at a moment's notice. Dr. Parry's superb ode "Blest Pair of Sirens," on the other hand, suffered from no such drawback and had full justice done to its beauties by both chorus and band. The soloists were Miss Emily Davies, Miss Jeanie Rankin, Messrs. Blagbro and France.

The York Musical Society performed "The Messiah" on the 5th ult., Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Sarah Berry, Messrs. Levant and Grice being the soloists, and Dr. Naylor the Conductor. On November 29 Messrs. Willy Hess, Briggs, Speelman and Vieuxtemps, all members of Sir Charles Hallé's band, gave an interesting quartet Concert, the programme including Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18) and Mendelssohn's Quartet in E (Op. 12), together with an unfinished work by Schubert in C minor, the beauty of which strongly impressed the audience. The Wakefield Choral Society, on the 5th ult., gave Haydn's "Seasons," under Mr. J. N. Hardy's conductorship. The principals were Mrs. Conway, Messrs. Child and Riley. A Concert given on the 7th ult., by the Ripon Choral Society, was both entertaining and educational. The programme consisted of a well-selected series of madrigals, from Morley's "My Bonny Lass" to Professor Stanford's "Sing, heigh ho!" which served as illustrations to a lecture by Miss Wakefield on "The Madrigal," dealing with its development and decline; with sundry hints as to its performance. Some seasonable remarks on the importance of the cultivation of sight-singing were as welcome as they were appropriate in the mouth of a lady who has done so much to foster a love of vocal music in country districts. Mr. C. L. Naylor conducted the madrigals. The Middlesbrough Musical Union, of which Mr. N. Kilburn is the Conductor, gave a Concert on the 13th ult., of which "Acis and Galatea" and Mr. Walthew's clever cantata "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" formed the most important features. The Prelude to Act 3 of Kistler's music-drama "Kunihild" was also in the nature of a novelty. Except for some slight uncertainty in attack, the chorus-singing was excellent. Miss Medora Henson, Messrs. Henry Piercy and David Hughes were the vocalists. The Mirfield Choral Society, on the 6th ult., gave a new cantata, "The Great Day of the Lord," composed by its Conductor (Mr. W. Clark Ainley), which was well received. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Hardy, Miss England, Messrs. Blagbro and Riley. On the 5th ult. the Batley Choral Society, under Mr. John Bowling, performed "Acis and Galatea" and Bennett's "May Queen," the soloists being Madame Clara Leighton, Messrs. Houghton and Ineson. At a special Advent Service in the Leeds Parish Church, "The Last Judgment" was given on the 11th ult. The Organist of the Parish Church (Mr. Alfred Benton) conducted, Dr. E. H. Turpin accompanying on the organ. On the 12th ult. the Whitby Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Hallgate, well known for many years as one of the most prominent amateurs in the district, gave a Concert, including Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and a portion of "Elijah." Miss Julia Jones and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail were the principal vocalists.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From our own Correspondent.

At the first Concert of the New York Symphony Society, Madame Materna sang with quite her old-time dramatic fervour the aria from "Don Giovanni" and the great Finale from "Tristan and Isolde." The remaining numbers were Symphony in C minor, by Brahms; the Overture to "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; the Pastorale of Boccherini; and the Scherzo from Quartet, No. 12, for strings (Cherubini). The orchestra gave evidence of unusual merit and conscientious study under Mr. Damrosch, and in no previous season has the augury been so good.

A hurried trip among out-of-town musicians gave me an opportunity to see something of their initial work. At Buffalo, Mr. Joseph Mischka has brought together a very fine body of singers, who are diligently rehearsing for their first Concert "The Oak," by G. J. Bennett; "The Wanderer's Night-song" (Charles Wood), Eaton Faning's "Liberty," Lyne's "Curfew Bell," and West's "Stars of the Summer Night."

In Syracuse, very good work is being done by Mr. Tom Ward, Mr. Richard Sutcliff (also a native of Britain, now with us), and Mr. George A. Parker, in charge of the School of Music at the University. A Recital, under the direction of this latter gentleman, showed, both in the character of the selections and in the performance, a high order of musical training among his pupils.

Mr. Theodore Thomas has returned to Chicago with renewed health after the unhappy experience of the Exposition, and has taken up his more congenial work with the Chicago Orchestra. The plans for the Cincinnati Festival are now definitely settled, and this will be given under the most favourable conditions; after which Mr. Thomas will probably enjoy needed rest.

The preliminary announcement of the Church Choral Society, under Mr. Richard Henry Warren, makes known the proposed work of the season in this splendid organisation. First Concert, "Lauda Sion" (Mendelssohn) and "Vexilla Regis" (H. R. Shelley), composed for the Society. Second Concert, Bach's Magnificat and Dvorák's Mass in D. These programmes show the maintenance of the lofty ideals characteristic of this Society; and the material is of more than usual excellence in numbers, voices, and musical ability.

The first Concert of the Oratorio Society took place on Friday and Saturday, the 1st and 2nd ult., when the famous "Missa Solemnis" by Edward Grell was sung a cappella with a chorus of 500 voices and four quartets, among whom were such artists as Miss Lillian Blavvelt, Mrs. Theodore Loedt, Mr. Rieger, Mr. Hallam, and others of equal excellence. The chorus was in admirable form, and responded sympathetically to Mr. Walter Damrosch's reading. The quartets were at times a little uncertain, but the result as a whole was very satisfactory, and reflects credit upon Mr. Damrosch and his singers.

A distinctly creditable performance of Mr. Parker's "Hora Novissima" was given on the first Sunday in Advent, at St. James Church, under the direction of Mr. A. S. Baker, with the assistance of Mr. Lowne (tenor) and Mr. Wilfred Walters (bass). This work is scored on such heroic lines that it is courageous in a choir to attempt it, therefore it is pleasant to be able to say that, barring the inevitable lack of forces—for only the ordinary choir was engaged—the interpretation was scholarly and musicianlike, while the solos were extremely well sung by the gentlemen mentioned. The "Spe modo vivitus" (No. 3) was sung with a fine mastery over the technical difficulties which are apparent, and Mr. Lowne sang the "Urbs Syon aurea" in a very finished and reverent manner. No work of recent times—certainly none by an American composer—has excited such widespread and favourable comment, and each hearing confirms the first impression, that it is very nearly—if not entirely—great.

In our neighbouring city of Philadelphia, Mr. W. W. Gilchrist continues his admirable work inaugurated last year by the Symphony Society. Last season's work included Beethoven's Symphony (No. 2), Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," Schubert's Unfinished B minor, Haydn's (No. 2), Jensen's "Hochzeit Muzik," and similar selections; and, judging from a recent rehearsal, the work of this season is intended to be of as high a character.

The Apollo Club, of Boston, with the assistance of Mrs. Emil Paur and Mr. Arthur Bassett (pianist), gave the first Concert of the season on November 22, under Mr. B. J. Long. Notably good numbers were "The whole Earth is at rest," by Sullivan; Meyerbeer's "My Native Land," with tenor solo, sung by Mr. Holden; and Van der Stucken's arrangement of Foster's "Old Folks at Home." This was the 139th Concert given by the Apollo Club, being the first Concert of the twenty-third season.

In Newark, N.J., on the 11th ult., the Schubert Vocal Society, under Professor L. A. Russell, with the assistance of a full orchestra and competent soloists, gave an excellent performance of "Elijah"—especially well sung were the solos, "If with all your hearts," by Mr. Autey, and "It is enough," by Dr. Carl E. Dufft. The chorus was not large, but efficient, and the entire Concert reflected great credit upon Mr. Russell, to whose energy much of the musical life of Newark is indebted.

The house-warming party given, on the 12th ult., by Mr. Dolmetsch in his new house at Dulwich, appropriately called "Dowland," was a great success. A most interesting Anthem, "Quam pulchra es," by Henry VIII., was sung to the original accompaniment of three viols and organ, a very pretty and sweet-toned instrument being used for the last part. An exceedingly elaborate Fantasia for the lute, by Dowland, was played by Mr. Dolmetsch, and a lovely Rondo of Marin Marais, for viol da gamba, by his daughter. The Concert-giver played the Passecaille of Handel's Suite in G minor with great effect upon a recently restored Kirkman harpsichord of extraordinarily fine quality; and the Prelude and Fugue in B flat from Bach's "48" on a fine clavichord; a pretty anonymous setting of "Have you seen but the bright lily grow?" and another song were sung to lute accompaniment, and a Concerto by Corelli was excellently played by way of Finale. The same programme, with some slight alterations, was repeated on the following Saturday afternoon at five o'clock, as the first of a series of Subscription Concerts; it is to be hoped that this praiseworthy undertaking will not suffer by the necessity imposed upon Londoners of undertaking a small railway journey, which, after all, is scarcely more troublesome than the expedition to Barnard's Inn.

On the 13th and 14th ult. two performances were given, at the Uxbridge Town Hall, of "No trifling with love," an adaptation, by Mr. Gordon Craig, of Alfred de Musset's play "On ne badine pas avec l'amour." The principal characters were sustained with much success by Miss Italia Conti and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Craig. An interesting feature of the performances was the incidental music, especially composed by E. Overbeck. This consists of a capital little Overture, constructed on several expressive and strongly contrasted themes, all of which occur again during the progress of the play; introductions to the various acts, and some effective melodramatic passages, which are both appropriate and helpful to the situations they illustrate. An attractive number was an interpolated song from the same pen, an impassioned and melodious little ditty. Good use has been made of a fine chant-like phrase, which no doubt has reference to the heroine's convent life. The orchestra consisted of only two violins, a violoncello, a harp, and a pianoforte; but, to judge from the pleasing results of this somewhat odd combination, the composer seems to have considerable knowledge of effect.

The North-West London Philharmonic Society began its third season on the 6th ult., at St. Martin's Town Hall, by giving proofs of continued progress under the conductorship of Mr. B. M. Carrodus. The instrumentalists numbered over seventy, and in nearly every piece in which they took part the performance was marked by the precision and vigour betokening careful rehearsal. The chief orchestral work was Haydn's Symphony in D major (the second of the Salaman set), played with all requisite neatness and animation. Among the other compositions for band alone were Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" Overture, Mr. Edward German's piquant Dances from the "Henry VIII." music, and the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." Mr. J. T. Carrodus contributed some violin pieces very acceptably, and Mr. R. Carrodus served as principal first violin in the band. Several songs were ably rendered by Miss Helen Pettican and Mr. Frederick Bevan, whilst Mr. H. C. Tonking was the accompanist.

The Mortlake and East Sheen Choral Society gave a Concert on the 5th ult., at the Mortlake Conservative Club. The principal work was Dr. C. H. Lloyd's cantata "Hero and Leander," which received a fair rendering, though the chorus-singing was somewhat timid and unsteady. The soloists were Mrs. Maude Panton and Mr. Gilbert Thorne. The second part was miscellaneous and consisted of part-songs, violin and violoncello solos played by Miss D. Vernet and Miss Vernet respectively, portions of a Pianoforte Trio by Gade, in which Mrs. Vernet joined the two ladies just named, and songs by Miss Louise Weaver, Mr. Emile Deplanche, and the two vocalists referred to above. Miss Weaver has a sympathetic contralto voice, of good range and power, which has been carefully trained. Mr. Gilbert Thorne's agreeable baritone gives promise of developing into a good useful organ. With further study the young artist will do well, for his singing shows aptitude and intelligent zeal.

The Advent performance at St. Paul's Cathedral of "The Last Judgment" took place on the 5th ult., and once more the vast building was densely filled long prior to the beginning of the two Psalms that, with some short prayers, preceded Spohr's lofty and melodiously expressive composition. The solos, like the choruses, were given by the Cathedral body, to whom, of course, the Oratorio offered no difficulties. The performance was listened to with reverential attention, and thus fulfilled one of the objects of its originator. The majority of the beautiful choral sections went throughout with boldness of attack and unanimous regard for the nicer details of the most popular of Spohr's productions. Dr. Martin conducted the choralists and instrumentalists from the lectern. The Fiftieth Psalm was sung to a chant by Purcell, and the "De Profundis" to an old chant by the Rev. William Felton, a vicar-choral at Hereford Cathedral nearly two hundred years ago.

The orchestral members of the London Organ School and International College of Music gave a Concert on November 29, at Princes' Hall, in the course of which medals and certificates lately gained by the pupils were presented by the Hon. Mrs. Townley Mitford. The band, augmented by a few professional players, thoroughly earned the applause awarded for their performance of the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," of the Overture to "Les Deux Journées," of Nos. 3, 2, and 1 of Grieg's set of Norwegian Dances (Op. 35), and other compositions. Dr. G. J. Bennett, the Conductor, had his executants completely in hand, and there were abundant indications that they were interested in their labours. Messrs. J. E. Hambleton and Edward O'Brien were respectively heard in violoncello and violin compositions, and Miss Beatrice Gough sang with judgment Lotti's air "Pur dicesti."

Mr. Frederic Griffith, for his Flute Recital at the Royal Academy of Music, on the 8th ult., was enabled to boast of a work written expressly for the occasion, and in the performance of which he had the assistance of the composer, Mr. J. Moir Clark, at the pianoforte. This novelty took the form of a Suite in four movements—namely, a Prelude, Gavotte, Notturno, and Finale. Of these preference must be given to the third, not only with respect to justification of title, but in the matter of fancy. In addition, Mr. Griffith played in finished style a Sonata in B minor of Bach (with Miss Llewela Davies as pianist) and several lighter compositions. Vocal pieces of a superior order were contributed by Miss Edith Hands (in lieu of Miss Louise Phillips) and Mr. Arthur Oswald.

Mr. Frank Moir's Concert at Princes' Hall, on the 4th ult., had among its principal features the admirable singing, by Mr. Plunket Greene, of songs by Grieg and Buononcini, and a folk-song, "The Golden Vanity." Something more than momentary curiosity was also experienced in the effective rendering, by Mr. Leonard Borwick, of pieces by Chopin and Liszt and (as an encore) Brahms's Intermezzo in E flat. Madame Marian McKenzie sang, with much expression, an aria from "Samson et Dalila"; and other artists appearing with success were Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Sauret. Several of Mr. Moir's songs in the programme were enthusiastically received by the large assemblage.

An afternoon Concert was given on the 13th ult. by the pupils of the School for the Blind, St. George's Fields, Southwark, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge. Mendelssohn's "He, watching over Israel," carefully accompanied on the organ by Lily Keppel, the Bridal Chorus from Cowen's "Rose Maiden," Eaton Faning's stirring "Song of the Vikings," and Schumann's "Gipsy Life" were rendered with precision and obvious enjoyment, while the unaccompanied numbers included "O Gladsome Light," Sullivan; Prendergast's "Phillis dyes her tresses black"; Barnby's madrigal, "It was a lover and his lass"; and Reay's part-song, "Fly, night, away." The Concert concluded with a performance of the school orchestra, under the direction of the bandmaster, Mr. Hall.

At the second of the Thursday Subscription Concerts this season, held in Princes' Hall on the 7th ult., the first part of the programme was drawn from the works of Dvorák. As regards instrumental pieces, the Bohemian musician was ably represented by the G minor Trio, played with genuine verve by Messrs. Peiniger, Brousil, and Webbe; and by the Violin Sonata in F major. Mr. William Nicholl, who has rapidly become one of the best of ballad singers, gave several pieces, including a couple of pleasing songs by Signorina E. Gambogi. This accomplished tenor not only accurately catches the character of the work he undertakes, but succeeds in bringing the same vividly yet unobtrusively before his hearers. Miss Louise Phillips also sang with brightness and fluency.

On the 19th ult. the violin students of the South London Institute of Music gave a Concert, under the direction of their instructor, Mr. T. E. Gatehouse. The selections, played by over eighty violins, with the addition of other stringed instruments, were rendered with remarkable precision and excellent phrasing, and included the Overture to the "Poet and Peasant," Mackenzie's "Benedictus," Boccherini's "Minuet," and the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. Miss Biddell played the pianoforte accompaniments in her usual careful manner, and Mr. Gatehouse played several solos with the success which generally accompanies his efforts. Vocal music was supplied by members of the Broughton Black's English Opera Company.

There is little to be said concerning the Concert of Violin and Pianoforte Music this season given by Mr. Sarasate and Madame Berthe Marx at St. James's Hall, on the 4th ult., the programme being less attractive and the audience smaller than usual. Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 96), Goldmark's Suite in E (No. 2), and Dvorák's four Slavonic Dances (Op. 72) were the concerted pieces, and it is almost needless to say that they were played with perfect unity of style and expression. The Spanish violinist gave his own clever and brilliant "Muñieira," and Madame Marx some pianoforte solos, both artists receiving and granting encores.

The St. Mary's Choral Society gave a Concert at the Bishop Wilson Memorial Hall, Islington, on the 12th ult., when Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" was the chief feature. The chorus, numbering sixty voices, did their work admirably, and the soloists were Miss Kate Cove, Miss Hettie Johnson, Mr. Sadleur Brown, and Mr. Edward Hann, the first-named lady being specially successful. The accompaniments were effectively played by Mr. Louis Rowe (pianoforte) and Mr. C. Hopkins Ould (organ); and Mr. Sidney Hann conducted with judgment, besides playing some pianoforte solos which were much applauded.

With the new year Mr. Henry J. B. Dart entered upon his duties as Organist and Choirmaster of St. James's, Sussex Gardens, the Parish Church of Paddington. It is gratifying to learn that he has been commissioned to carry on his Sunday afternoon performances of Oratorio, under more favourable conditions than existed at his former church, St. John's, Waterloo Road. As a mark of personal esteem and appreciation for his work at this church, he has been presented by the congregation with a drawing-room timepiece and inlaid table, and by the members of the choir with an address and dining-room clock.

Mr. Frederic Skeen gave an Evening Concert at the Parochial Hall, Balham, on November 29, when he was assisted by Miss Susetta Fenn, Miss Emma Skeen, M. Deplanche, the Bassino Quartet, and Miss Amy Birch (violin), all of whose efforts were much appreciated by the audience. The Concert-giver was unable to sing owing to indisposition and was replaced by Mr. Bailey. Variety was afforded to the programme by the excellent recitations given by Miss Olive Kennett, whose charm of voice and rare elocutionary ability at once won the heartiest approval of the audience.

During the past year Organ Recitals have been given at South Hackney Parish Church on the first Sunday of each month, after Evensong, by the Organist, Mr. John E. West. The programmes have covered an extensive range of organ music, including half-a-dozen of the larger Preludes and Fugues of Bach, five Sonatas of Mendelssohn, three of Rheinberger, and two of Merkel; also works by Best, Chipp, Dubois, Guilmant, Handel, Hesse, Saint-Saëns, Salomé. Schumann, Silas, Smart, S. S. Wesley, and others. The Recitals will be continued monthly.

The first Subscription Concert of the Wickham Park Musical Society was given on the 4th ult., at St. John's, when Cowen's "St. John's Eve" was performed. The solos were well rendered by Miss Agnes Walker, Miss Sherley Price, Mr. George Neville, and Mr. G. A. Calder. The second part was miscellaneous, and consisted of songs by Miss Agnes Walker, Messrs. Neville and Calder, a duet by the Misses Martin and Lindale, and part-songs by the choir. Miss Goodchild was the accompanist, and Mr. R. Frederic Tyler very ably conducted.

The London Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. W. de Manby Sergison, sang an admirable selection of glees and part-songs at its Smoking Concert on the 19th ult., at Anderton's Hotel. The vocal solos included "The Requital," sung by Mr. E. R. Burry, and Molloy's "Punchinello," given by Mr. T. Fidge, and pleasing variety was obtained by the effective clarinet playing of Mr. Charles Draper and the clever pianoforte solos contributed by Mr. Gilbert Tozer.

On the 10th ult., at Stepney Meeting House, was held the usual monthly Musical Service, when the choir, assisted by an orchestra, and conducted by Mr. R. D. Metcalfe, gave a capital rendering of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." These Services have been exceedingly popular, and another large audience is expected on the 14th inst., when Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" will be given.

Mr. W. de Manby Sergison resumed last month his Saturday afternoon Organ Recitals, at 6 p.m., at St. Peter's, Eaton Square. They will be continued throughout this month.

MR. W. H. CUMMINGS lectured, on the 14th ult., at the London Institution, on "Canons and Catches," a subject upon which his antiquarian knowledge and research rendered him peculiarly able to speak with authority. Numerous illustrations were sung by six efficient vocalists and the pianists were Miss May Cummings and Mr. Norman Cummings.

ONE of the earliest performances in London of A. R. Gaul's new Cantata "Una" was given on the 7th ult., by the Putney Orchestral and Choral Society, under the Conductorship of Mr. Frank Barnard. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Spells, Miss Clara Robson, Mr. J. Bartlett, and Mr. T. Powley; and the important harp accompaniments were played by Mr. G. T. Miles.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" on the 6th ult., at St. Mary's, Hoxton. The soloists were Miss Margaret Ormerod, Mrs. Oram, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

MISS L. RAMANN is to be heartily congratulated on the completion of the fourth and last volume of her "Liszt" biography, which has just been issued by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig.

CANDIDATES for the examinations of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music can enter their names up to the 31st inst. Full particulars will be found in our advertising columns.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of the "Handel" Number of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

REVIEWS.

Organ Arrangements. Edited by George C. Martin. Nos. 10-16. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTWITHSTANDING the rapid issue of new compositions for the "king of instruments" by composers of ability, English and foreign, at the present time, transcriptions continue in request; and it will probably be ever thus, as the power and variety of the organ are practically illimitable, and extracts from the choral and orchestral works of the great masters, if skilfully transcribed and artistically executed, are always more or less effective. The first three numbers of the present series should be welcomed if only because they consist of unhackneyed selections. They comprise in order a quaint but effective Chaconne in F, by Purcell, arranged by A. W. Marchant; an Adagio in B minor, by Mozart, from the same transcriber; and the Adagio from Beethoven's Sextet for strings and horns (Op. 81), arranged by Arthur B. Plant. In No. 13 we have a beautiful movement from the Second Act of Gluck's "Orpheus," neatly arranged by E. J. Bellerby. Mr. John E. West is responsible for No. 14, the beautiful "Judex" from Gounod's "Mors et Vita," which for obvious reasons he has transposed from the key of G flat to G natural. The last two for the present are respectively the Introduction to the Third Act of Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Bridal Chorus from the same work. These pieces are now in strong demand at wedding services, and Dr. Creser's excellent arrangements should therefore be welcome.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 428-435. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first number in this batch of recently published anthems is "My God, I love Thee," by George J. Bennett, being a setting for tenor solo and chorus of the familiar hymn. Dr. Bennett's style of writing is equally noteworthy for refined musicianship and deep expressiveness. Though he has been careful not to overtax the capacity of an ordinary church choir, every phrase is interesting, the platitudes which form the stock-in-trade of many composers being studiously avoided, though without any apparent effort. No. 429, "O praise God in His holiness," is a newly harmonised version, by George C. Martin, of an ancient chant, the words being, of course, the 150th Psalm. Those who favour antiquarian ecclesiastical music will find something to interest them in Dr. Martin's little adaptation. The next, No. 430, is "O God, who hast prepared," by A. Wellesley Batson, a short full anthem for general use, smoothly and pleasantly written, and capable of being sung without accompaniment. It is a setting of the Collect for the Sixth Sunday after Trinity. The same composer supplies the next two anthems, "Make me a clean heart" and "They that sow in tears," both suitable for Lenten or general use. The former commences with a quartet which is repeated in chorus, a brief fugato making an effective contrast. The latter is full throughout, and may be commended for tunefulness, simplicity, and chastened expression. Nos. 433 and 434 are by Arthur Whiting, the first, "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel," consisting of one rather extended chorus in six-four measure, generally flowing and melodious; while the other, "Lord, Thou hast searched me," is varied by a brief but vigorous recitative for tenor. It is noteworthy and commendable that the composer treats the word "searched" as of one syllable only. No. 435, "O worship the King," by the Rev. E. V. Hall, is a bright and joyous setting of a well-known hymn, and, though primarily intended for harvest festivals, will be found suitable for many other occasions almost equally as well.

Progressive Studies. Book 8, Part IV., Broken Chords; Book 19, Part III., Velocity; Book 26, Parts I. and II., Broken Thirds, Sixths, and Octaves; Book 30, Part III., Shakes; Book 38, Part II., Chords; Book 51, Part I., and Book 52, Part II., Rhythm. By Franklin Taylor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS interesting series has already been mentioned in these columns, but a few remarks respecting the above Books may be added. Among the "Broken Chord" exercises, besides well-known ones by Czerny and Cramer, we have two by Kalkbrenner, and a very useful one by Ries, Beethoven's pupil. Czerny naturally occupies a prominent place under "Velocity"; the other names are Steibelt, Cramer, and Berger, Mendelssohn's teacher. The collection of exercises on "Broken Thirds," &c., is both varied and interesting; it contains three excellent ones not only as exercises, but as music, by Aloys Schmitt, the teacher of Hiller. Under "Shakes," Czerny again is prominent, and there are also two from the famous first set of Studies by Moscheles, another teacher, by the way, of Mendelssohn. The "Chord" Book is also attractive. Rhythm is a word specially applied to the grouping of notes, and the Books under notice present to us a variety of patterns. There is a general impression that what is old is old-fashioned; many players would consider Bertini as passè. Not so Mr. Franklin Taylor, who has as many as six by that composer. And, apart from their educational value, they are pleasing as music. Surely Heller must have been influenced by No. 5 when he wrote his Etude (Op. 90, No. 3). The Kalkbrenner Study (No. 7) is excellent practice in the art of attending to various rhythms at the same time. The short Clementi Study (No. 8) is as serviceable as it is short. The last exercise in Book 51 is a dainty little Gigue in F minor, by Bach, from an unfinished Suite. Book 52 contains, among other things, an elegant Study composed by the editor himself. All the numbers are carefully phrased and fingered.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 191, 192, and 193. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these pieces is entitled "Savoyard Chant," and bears the name of Herbert W. Wareing, a young composer who has already contributed to the series. His present effort is a piquant sketch in song form, tuneful but not trivial, and by no means difficult. The next number consists of three Intermezzi by Alan Gray. These are quiet and smoothly written trifles, eminently suitable for church voluntaries. The most pleasing is the third, a pretty little sketch in D minor. No. 193 is a Solemn Processional March by C. J. B. Meacham, composed in commemoration of the first visit of the Church Congress to Birmingham. Its title is fully justified, but though stately and dignified it is by no means dull. The middle section, both in key and phraseology, suggests the influence of Mendelssohn in the corresponding portion of his War March of the Priests, but there is no actual plagiarism.

Sonate pour Piano et Violon. Par E. Overbeck. [London: Charles Woolhouse.]

The perusal of this work has given us considerable pleasure, for it is long since we have met with a piece in the grand old Sonata form containing so much that is fresh, spontaneous, and enjoyable. The themes are throughout well coined, and full of emotional, though not sentimental, qualities. It is, in fact, as a melodist pure and simple that the composer appeals to us most, and this being the feature most rarely met with in our younger musicians, we mention the fact with special satisfaction. Some of the subjects are excellent—e.g., those of the opening Allegro, the first of which is not unworthy of Brahms in his most genial mood. The Andante has a plaintive theme, suggestive of the "dark, but true and tender North," and accompanied in a thoroughly charming and refined manner. We care less for the Intermezzo-like Più mosso, which twice interrupts its tranquil, pensive flow of melody. A very spirited, though not remarkably original, Scherzo is followed by a delicious Trio—a little gem. The Finale opens with a sombre and striking theme in octaves, which is effectively contrasted by a melodious yet impassioned second subject. A bold and vigorous Coda brings the Sonata to a conclusion.

Village Scenes. A Cantata for female voices. Words by Clifton Bingham; music by Frederic H. Cowen. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The librettist of this unpretentious little work does not offer a connected story, contenting himself with stringing together half-a-dozen sets of stanzas in varying metre, the separate titles being "The Village Green," "The Pedlar," "The Children at play," "The Gipsy," "The Old Hall," and "The Curfew." How well suited to Mr. Cowen's light and tasteful pen are such themes as these need hardly be said. His music is for soprano and contralto soloists and two-part chorus. The voice parts are throughout extremely simple, but the dainty and piquant accompaniments require a skilful pianist to render them full justice—that is to say, to bring out all the effects intended by the composer.

Leidvoll-Freudvoll. 4te grosse Concert-Arie für die Clarinette in B. By Michael Bergson. Op. 102. [Offenbach-am-Main: Johann André.]

The composer, for many years director and teacher of the Geneva Conservatoire, has here written two showy movements for the clarinet; so showy, indeed, that at times we meet with an ossia or simplifiée. The music, light and graceful, shows in places the influence of Weber. The orchestral accompaniment has been arranged for pianoforte. The title of the work under notice recalls, by the way, two little pieces for pianoforte by Beethoven, the one entitled "Lustig," the second, "Traurig." M. Bergson, however, adhering to the usual order, changes mourning into gladness.

Rêverie Pathétique. Pour le Violon avec accompagnement de Piano. Par Angelo Mascheroni. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

The broad melody, with its melancholy beseeching tones, and with its great variety of rhythm, requires an interpreter of great feeling and intelligence. The Maestoso Grandioso is impressive, while the Coda, with its soft, piquant cadences, forms an excellent contrast. With the exception of this Coda, the pianoforte part is not particularly attractive.

Naissance d'Amour. Mélodie pour Violoncelle et Piano. Par Maude Valérie White. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

A flowing, graceful piece, and one with which "My dear little friend, Jean Gérardy," to whom it is dedicated, will win many a success on the Concert platform. The composer, by tasteful harmonies and pleasing rhythm, has raised the pianoforte part above the level of an ordinary accompaniment.

The Oesterlein Richard Wagner Museum, Vienna, has just acquired the death-mask of the master, taken by the sculptor, A. Benvenuto, on February 13, 1883.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The Frankfort-on-Main St. Cecilia Society celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of its foundation, on November 22, with a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D.

A new Overture, entitled "Sappho," by Carl Goldmark, was lately produced at Vienna, under Dr. Hans Richter, and has since been played at Dresden and Berlin. The composer has not stated whether he has endeavoured to give a character portrait of the Greek poetess, or whether his work is to be a prelude to Grillparzer's Tragedy "Sappho." In any case, it is said to be an important work, both as regards its contents and orchestration. The latter is pronounced superb, his treatment of the harp being especially effective and original.

There are no doubt still some people left who repeat the old parrot cry that there is no melody in Wagner's music. For them even the "Meistersinger," with its incomparable wealth of the most entrancing melody, has no charm, and, we daresay, never will have. Referring to this glorious work a German critic, Herr Th. Goering, used a happy simile when criticising the recent first performance of Ignaz Brüll's opera "Check to the King," which is said to contain numerous reminiscences of the "Meistersinger": "As the Colosseum in Rome served for centuries as a quarry, so in these days Wagner's works seem destined to become an inexhaustible mine for the coming generation of opera composers. Fortunately the original work will thereby suffer no harm; on the contrary, this exploitation will be to its advantage, because many will no doubt only by this means become aware how much melody it contains."

Herr Jean Louis Nicodé gave, on the 4th ult., the first of a series of four Concerts at Dresden with his orchestra, the Chemnitz Städtische Kapelle. The programme included Brahms's First Symphony, and works by Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz, and Lalo. The local press speaks in the highest terms of Herr Nicodé's conducting, his rendering of the splendid Symphony being described as a perfect revelation to the Dresden public.

A new Einakter, "Sanna," by Georg Rauchenecker, was produced on November 19 at Elberfeld, with great success. It is said that the score of this work was returned unopened from the recent Gotha Prize Competition.

Three movements—viz., the Kyrie, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei—from a new Mass for double chorus, soli, and orchestra, by Max Bruch, were recently produced at a Concert at Barmen, and made a deep impression.

A new Mass in B flat minor, by Albert Becher, was lately produced in the Luther Church, Dresden, with great success. It is said to be a work of unusual merit.

Ignaz Brüll's new opera "Check to the King" was, on November 24, successfully produced at the Munich Court Theatre.

Madame Lillie Lehmann, the famous dramatic soprano, gave two Robert Franz evenings lately at Dresden and Berlin. The programme consisted of twenty of the finest specimens of the great and much-neglected song-writer's genius. Madame Lehmann's splendid performance roused her audiences to genuine enthusiasm.

"King Arthur," a new opera in three acts and a prelude, was, on November 26, produced at the New Stadt-Theater, Leipzig, but failed to please. The composer is Max Vogrich, a German living in America, and a late pupil of the Leipzig Conservatoire.

On November 13 a new one-act comic opera, "Der Procurador von San Juan," by J. Krug-Waldsee, was produced with much success at the Mannheim Court Theatre.

At a Concert which she gave at Berlin, on the 8th ult., Madame Sophie Menter played the solo part in some "Zigeunerweisen" for pianoforte and orchestra of her own composition. M. Sapellnikoff joined her in a performance of Liszt's "Concert Pathétique," and also conducted the rest of the programme.

The latest addition to the long list of "eminent" conductors is no less a personage than the German Emperor. According to the Cologne Gazette, he took the bâton recently at a hunt dinner, and conducted a march played by the band of a regiment of Uhlans.

Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have in the press a new volume of letters by Franz Liszt. It will be edited by the well-known writer on musical subjects, La Mara (Frau Marie Lipsius), and its title will be "Letters to a Friend"—the said friend being a lady who was a pupil of Liszt's at Weimar, and afterwards lived at Bruxelles.

Max Bruch has just completed a new work, "Leonidas," for baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra. It is his Opus 66.

Besides the pianoforte pieces, Op. 118 and Op. 119, already referred to in a previous number, Brahms has written fifty-one Studies for the same instrument. They will no doubt be exceedingly interesting, but the countless admirers of the greatest living composer will wish that he would devote his genius to the production of works of greater importance.

A Bohemian composer, hitherto unknown to fame and the musical dictionaries (not quite the same thing this!), Pan Wilhelm Blodek, had a comic "Einakter" performed recently at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater. Blodek's music is described as exceedingly fresh, and quite free from imitations of the two fashionable dramatic composers of the day. We refer, of course, to Wagner and Mascagni, if we may place these names in juxtaposition without offending the Intermezzo worshippers.

A grand old man is the Organist of the Cathedral of St. Stephen, Vienna—the composer, Gottfried Preyer. He was born on March 15, 1808, and became a pupil of the same Simon Sechter to whom poor Schubert intended to go for lessons in counterpoint in 1827, a year before his death. Herr Preyer is consequently one of the few remaining links which connect the present time with the great classic period of German music. Not long ago he celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his appointment as Organist to the famous Dome of the Kaiserstadt. Although in his eighty-seventh year he is still hale and hearty, and attends to his duties with remarkable vigour.

M. Bruneau's new opera, "L'Attaque du Moulin," has been treated by the Paris press in very much the same fashion as his first work of the kind, "Le Rêve," some critics denouncing it in severe terms, while others are full of praise of the many beauties of the score. There seems to be no doubt, however, that it is an advance on the earlier work, both as regards the melodic invention and the harmonisation—the latter being less uncouth than that of the "Dream."

The series of grand Concerts recently started at the Paris Eden Theatre, under M. Colonne, has already come to an inglorious end, the public having failed to support the enterprise. There is now some talk of turning the theatre into a café-concert, or, as we would say, music hall.

The production of Wagner's "Tristan" in Paris has had to be postponed once more. The elaborate rehearsals for the grand Russian fête at the Opéra interfered very much with those for Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Massenet's "Thais," both of which are due before "Tristan." The latter work cannot now be given before October next. The cast will include Mesdames Bréval and Deschamps-Jehin, MM. Jean de Reszké and Delmas.

Massenet has composed an Epilogue to his opera "Manon." It is in one act, is entitled "Le portrait de Manon," and set to a libretto by George Boyen.

M. Bruneau's much-discussed opera "Le Rêve" was performed three times at Bruxelles during last month, Mdlle. Simonnet being the heroine, Angélique. Her exquisite performance produced a very great impression, and the whole work was much enjoyed by crowded audiences, who do not seem to have minded the composer's fearful progressions in the least.

Signor Ricordi, the Milan publisher, visited Paris recently to arrange for the production of Verdi's "Otello" at the Grand Opéra, and the same master's "Falstaff" at the Opéra Comique. He was successful as regards the latter work, which M. Carvalho will produce towards the end of the season, with M. Maurel as the fat knight. Messieurs Bertrand and Gailhard, on the other hand, will have nothing to do with "Otello." They are, no doubt, of opinion that one "foreigner" is all they can admit to the great National institution for the present. Moreover, Wagner just now spells success—Verdi might spell failure—in France.

If there is one person who ought to be heartily tired of the everlasting Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," it should surely be the composer. But he is evidently nothing of the kind, for at a recent Concert at Pisa the thing was played on two pianofortes and a harmonium, the performers being Maëstri Mascagni, Mugnone, and Menichetti. Let us hope that this new arrangement "made in Italy" will be mercifully reserved for the edification of the composer's compatriots only.

"Messinella," a new opera by Giuseppi Brunetti, was recently produced with much success at the Theatre Cerrati, Cagliari. Another novelty, the opera "Vandea," by Filippo Clementi, was, on the other hand, a failure at the Teatro Communale, Bologna. Yet another, called "Marilka," by Giulio Tanara, given at the Victor Emanuel Theatre, Turin, was only moderately successful. A fourth is "Gualtiero Swarten," by Andrea Gnaga. This was produced with "brilliant success" on November 30, at Milan.

"Halte! Marche! En Avant!" is the peculiar title of a new "Military" opera lately produced with great success at the Theatre Andreani, Mantua. The composer is Fulgenzio Guerrieri, of the Liceo Rossini, Pesaro.

"Milo Standis" (anglicé, Miles Standish) is the title of a new opera by Lorenzo Perigozzo, which was recently produced with success at the Ristori Theatre, Verona.

The municipality of St. Petersburg intends to name a street after the late Peter Tschaikowsky, and to open a subscription for the purpose of erecting a monument to the deceased master.

A Russian paper is responsible for the statements that Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera "Moses" will be produced during the current month at the German Theatre, Riga, for the first time in its entirety, and that the expenses, which will amount to about 10,000 roubles, have been "guaranteed" by subscriptions.

A new Symphony in A minor, by Victor Bendix, was produced at a recent Concert at Copenhagen with very great success. The work presents the unusual feature of concluding with an Adagio instead of an Allegro. The composer, who conducted, was enthusiastically applauded.

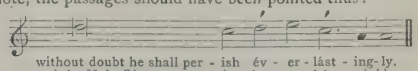
CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ART OF CHANTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your courteous review of my little book your reviewer has, though quite unintentionally, I feel sure, done me serious injustice, through misunderstanding, and, in consequence, misinterpreting the principle I advocate with regard to the mediation of the chant. I regret that I did not see the review earlier, but I shall be glad if you will allow me in an early issue, both in justice to myself and in order to remove a suspicion of intentional unfairness on the part of the reviewer which some entertain, but which I do not share, to point out the cause, as I think, of the very natural misapprehension which has led him to credit me with advocating a theory of chant-mediation accentuation opposite to that which my little book upholds.

One word first as to my illustrations from Merbecke. The accents are my own: those over the notes are intended to show the generally accepted accentuation of the chant phrase now-a-days; those over the text to show where Merbecke laid stress. Modern usage would, probably, accentuate the first C of the cadence in all verses; Merbecke apparently regarded the accentuation as variable. Generally, he treated the D following the C as the accented note, but sometimes the C itself; generally, also, the penultimate, but, occasionally, the antepenultimate; the final he regarded as common, but in one instance assigned to it an accented, followed by an unaccented syllable. What I call "wildly eccentric" in Merbecke's setting is, as the context makes clear, not the accentuation of D instead of C, but the unnecessary piling up of syllables on cadence notes. Accepting D instead of C as the accented note, the passages should have been pointed thus:—



The eccentricity of Merbecke's pointing is not in the least affected by the change of accent from C to D.

The great misapprehension on the part of your reviewer that I wish to remove is, however, this: he has assumed that I am advocating, in the "Art of Chanting," the principle of mediation-pointing found in my Anglican Psalter, and he has, consequently, misunderstood both, and put a mark for strong accent in his quotation from the Psalter in a different place to that in which the theory adopted assumes it to be. The short-mediation theory on which the Psalter works assumes that the first note of the mediation is accented and the last common, thus—

My reasons for adopting this theory will be found in "Art of Chanting," page 36, and for abandoning it on pages 20 and 21, and my experience regarding it I have embodied on page 37 in these words: "The reading of the mediation adopted . . . demands considerable discretion to be exercised in the selection of chants, if the best results are to be obtained. Those chants work best that will bear a stronger accent on the first note of the mediation than on the third, while those with an upward skip to the third note are less satisfactory, and if the skip be wide should be regarded as almost, if not quite, inadmissible." If I were re-editing my Psalter-Chants the one quoted by your reviewer (Cooke in F) would be withdrawn as not being capable, with short-mediation pointing, of the best results. For the long-mediation pointing I support in the "Art of Chanting" it would do well, and I venture to append a few passages thus pointed to show what I really do advocate—

I am afraid the reviewer thinks me "abominable in my doings," but words that ought not to be given for musical treatment should not form the test of the value of a pointing. We can only try to make the best of a bad job with them, and it is impossible to give more than the barest indication of the way a pointer may wish such words rendered by the bar-lines. Take, e.g., "testimonies"—

but I will consider thy | tes - ti - | mo - | nies.
but I will consider thy | tes - | timo - | nies.
but I will consider | thy | testimo - | nies.
but I will con - | sider . thy | testimo - | nies.
but I will con - | sider thy | testi - | monies.
but I will con - | sider | thy | testimonies.
but | I . will con- | sider thy | testimonies.

All these settings but the last two can, I find, be rendered smoothly and satisfactorily with more or less care on the part of the singer; but I am inclined to prefer the fifth, for which there is precedent in Tallis's Psalm-setting.

Your reviewer is evidently poking fun when he suggests that "louhoud cyhimbals" must be the result of singing two notes to a syllable. I have heard choristers sing "O O O O O Christ" in the Te Deum, and sometimes with H before the O, but I have not thought the offence fairly chargeable on the pointing.

Once again, your reviewer has mistaken the entire gist of my contention on a most important point, probably through some lack of lucidity in expression on my part. I do not contend that we ought "to point our Psalms to suit a penultimate accent because the Anglican chant ought to have 'developed a tail' of this form." What I do contend for is this—that the prevailing accentuation of the psalm-verse endings being a penultimate one, such existing chants only should be in regular use that will, more or less happily, fall in with it, and that in new chant compositions such accentuation should be strictly recognised; a new, wide, and useful field will thus lie open for church musicians to occupy.

Apologising for this intrusion on your space, and acknowledging your courtesy in allowing me to set myself right with your reviewer and readers,

I am, faithfully yours,

John Heywood.

[We are glad to see Mr. Heywood's letter in print; but he has not explained away any of our arguments against his theories. He still insists on making unjustifiable emendations of Merbecke. He has published a pointed Psalter, but has since abandoned one of its leading principles. But on his last adopted system he is unable to answer our question: why should we sing Cymbals, and in the same verse immediately afterwards cym-Bals? Mr. Heywood says he does not point the Psalms to suit a chant with an "undeveloped tail"; but he intends only to select chants which suit his pointing. The distinction is a nice one. We do not think we have given the least cause for complaint.—The Reviewer.

WAGNER'S OVERTURE "COLUMBUS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The early works of Richard Wagner have had some extraordinary adventures, but none have been so unfortunate as the Overture to Apel's drama "Columbus." The long-lost Overture was composed at Magdeburg, and performed there twice in 1835; reproduced at Riga in 1838; and on February 4, 1841, at a Concert given in the Salle St. Honoré in Paris, to the subscribers of the Revue et Gazette Musicale, by Schlesinger, the great publisher of the period. Amongst those who appeared at that now historical Concert were Sir Charles Hallé and the once famous singer Mdlle. Loëwe. Berlioz, in the Journal des Débats, records that the magnificent playing of M. Hallé was hardly listened to, the attraction of the afternoon being the charming vocalist who had just arrived in Paris, after a series of triumphs in Germany. The Overture "Columbus" seems to have created little impression on Berlioz, as he did not even mention it in his account of the Concert. Wagner, as a contributor to the Gazette Musicale, however, had no reason to complain of his other confrères on the Parisian press. Wagner's colleague on the Gazette Musicale, Henri Blanchard, who wrote an account of the Concert, says: "This piece, which has more the character and form of an introduction, is it worthy of the designation of 'Overture,' so well defined recently by the composer in the Gazette Musicale? Was his aim to depict the infinite open sea, the horizon that seemed without end to the companions of the celebrated navigator, by the shrill tremolo of the violins? The entry of brass instruments re-appears, too, without variation and with too much persistency, and on this occasion their discordance did not permit the proper appreciation of the value of M. Wagner's work, which, notwithstanding this disappointment, appeared to us to emanate from an artist having large ideas, and who is a master of the resources of modern instrumentation." The musical critic of L'Artiste, A. Specht, writes: "The composer of the Overture 'Christophe Colomb,' M. Richard Wagner, is one of the most distinguished contributors to the Gazette Musicale. We were curious to judge the application of his theories on the conception of the Overture explained recently by him with so much talent. That of 'Christophe Colomb' is divided into two movements, in the first of which the composer's aim is to depict the hesitations and discouragements of his hero, whose constant thoughts are guided by a voice from above. Unfortunately, the principal theme which translates this idea was given to the trumpet, which was constantly out of tune. The meaning of this clever composition was only understood by a very small portion of serious listeners. The ideas are noble, of artistic finish, and the concluding very short Allegro expresses with a grand elevation the success of Columbus. Valentino's orchestra ought to make amends to M. Wagner."

The criticisms in the other Parisian newspapers and periodicals of the time either confirm this opinion or simply predicted a great future for the young composer of the "Columbus" Overture. How these predictions have been fulfilled the world knows.

The Gazette Musicale performance was the last; and according to most of Wagner's biographers the score and orchestral parts disappeared and have never been seen since. M. Adolphe Jullien, the great composer's most sympathetic French biographer, however, asserts that Wagner, encouraged by the success of the Parisian performance, sent the MS. through Lafitte and Caillard, a parcel delivery agency, to Jullien, who at the time was conducting Promenade Concerts in London. It was returned through the same source, but Wagner being unable to pay the carriage the parcel was naturally brought back to the warehouse. M. Jullien says these details were related by Wagner himself in 1880, to one of his friends, who determined to make a search for the missing Overture. The firm of Lafitte et Caillard has been defunct for many years, and after a long search in vain, M. Jullien's friend discovered that M. Caillard, who was very old but still hale and hearty, resided in the same flat as himself. He made up his mind to go and visit the old gentleman, but having delayed it for some days, was surprised one morning on coming downstairs to find out that M. Caillard had just died. M. Jullien's account is very interesting, but it is rather improbable that the old man after nearly half-a-century could have remembered what became of a particular paper parcel. If the MS. was really brought back by Lafitte and Caillard's man, it must have been disposed of in due course as lumber with the rest of the unpaid parcels.

The present writer, however, is of opinion that the Overture was mislaid at Schlesinger's, and subsequently stored away by mistake with music for which there was no current demand. That the MS. Overture, along with other music which at one time formed part of Schlesinger's circulating library, was disposed of to a second-hand bookseller, the present writer is almost certain, as he distinctly remembers having seen Wagner's work on one of the old bookstalls on the quay of the Nôtre Dame side of the Seine, one afternoon in August during the Paris Exhibition year of 1878. The title-page of the score was in German, but the title and directions of some of the parts were in French. The quality of the paper of the score was inferior to the parts, which were probably copied out in Paris. The handwriting of the score and parts was the same. The present writer purchased that afternoon of Schlesinger's old stock the full score of Sacchini's "Renaud," two of Meyerbeer's early operas—"Margherita d'Anjou" and "Il Crociato in Egitto"—and a set of orchestral parts of one of Hummel's Concertos. The old woman who had charge of the boxes only asked forty centimes for the score and parts of Wagner's "Columbus," but being at the time only a raw musical student with a limited supply of pocket money, and having expended the available small silver and coppers on Sacchini, Meyerbeer, and Hummel, he asked her to put it on one side for a couple of days. The woman consented but failed to keep her promise. The "music written by hand," the woman said, when the present writer called again with the fourpence in his pocket, "was sold the same afternoon with a small parcel of other pieces to a fair young lady with spectacles." The woman was unable to give any information concerning the young lady, never having seen her before that afternoon, but believed that she was an Englishwoman. If the musical Columbus, after his many adventures, really accompanied the young lady on her return to England, it is to be hoped that some lucky individual will eventually find him out, and introduce him to new friends in a London concert-room, who would surely accord him a hearty welcome.

Yours truly,

Andrew de Ternant.

DR. ROBERTS'S RESIGNATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your short paragraph stating that Dr. Roberts has resigned the post of Conductor of the Oxford Choral and Philharmonic Society, you add: "During his tenure a heavy financial debt has been paid off." It is only fair to the Society to say that this debt was paid off by the very generous donations of the members and friends of the Society; and without the least wish to disparage Dr. Roberts's merits and kindness as Honorary Conductor, it should be known that Dr. Roberts's success was in closer relation to the musical prestige of the Society than its financial condition.—Yours faithfully, December 15, 1893. A Member.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ashburne, Derbyshire.— The newly-formed Choral Society gave its first Concert on the 5th ult., when Haydn's "Imperial" Mass and Jensen's "The Feast of Adonis" were sung with orchestral accompaniment. The Misses Marshall-Ward, Mr. G. Moon, and Mr. H. G. England were the soloists, all of whose efforts were well appreciated, and the chorus gave promise of good things to come. The band was formed chiefly from the Ashburne Orchestral Society. Mr. W. H. Tutt conducted.

Basingstoke.—The first Concert of the Basingstoke Choral Society was given in the Town Hall, on the 12th ult. The first part consisted of Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," the principal parts of which were sustained by Miss Alice Simons, Miss Vena Galbraith, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. A miscellaneous selection completed the programme, in which the above vocalists sang songs. Mr. Charles Griffiths played two violin solos, "Concerto Romantique" (Godard) and "Faust" (Sarasate), and the chorus sang two part-songs, "Parting Kiss" (Pinsuti) and "Two Cupids" (Wellesley Batson), admirably. Mrs. H. Seymour (pianoforte) and Mr. S. F. Summers (harmonium) acted as accompanists, the Conductor being Mr. H. E. Powell.

Berkhampstead.—On November 29 the Church Choral Society gave a spirited performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner." The soloists were Miss Whitfield (soprano), Miss Tatham (contralto), Mr. Page (tenor), Mr. Broughton Black (bass). A small but efficient string band was engaged. Mr. F. Whatmoor presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. T. Bavin at the harmonium. The cantata was followed by a selection of songs, &c. The Rev. C. J. Langley conducted.

Biggleswade.—A large audience was attracted to the Town Hall, on the 14th ult., by the Biggleswade Choral Society's performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." Miss Kate Cherry, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Heath were the soloists; Mr. C. E. Buckingham led an efficient string orchestra; Miss W. Bennett presided at the pianoforte; Mr. E. P. Cooper rendered valuable assistance at the organ; and Mr. J. G. Cooper conducted with skill.

Bury St. Edmunds.—At St. Mary's Church, on the 14th ult., Spohr's "Last Judgment" was sung by the choir, Mr. H. T. Tiltman presiding at the organ.

Cape Town.—A numerous audience attended the last Concert of the season of the Mendelssohn Society, given on November 17, at the Good Hope Hall. The most important work in the programme was J. B. van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," in which the soprano solos were effectively sung by Mrs. Edward Mills. The choruses and orchestral accompaniments were also well rendered. The soloists in the miscellaneous portion were Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Jepp, Miss Van der Ven, Miss Dale, and Messrs. Baxter, Eckard, and Leo Keyser. Miss Fisk and Miss Dale assisted in the various pianoforte accompaniments, and Mr. Bull conducted.——An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given, under exceptionally favourable conditions, on November 26, in the Good Hope Hall, which was completely filled by an appreciative audience. The soloists were Mrs. Bedford, Miss Annie Griffith, Mr. Vernon Reid, Mr. E. Stapleton, and Dr. Murray. The choruses were sung with admirable precision by the combined choral societies, and the occasion reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Barrow Dowling.

CHELMSFORD.—Though we are now quite accustomed to see ladies in the orchestra, it is almost without precedent that the players should consist exclusively of the gentler sex. But at the Concert given on the 21st ult. by the English Ladies' Orchestral Society, under the able direction of Mr. J. S. Liddle, not only the string parts, but also the brass and the wood-wind, including a saxophone, were played by ladies. The programme included the Allegretto from Haydn's Symphony in G, the familiar Minuet from Mozart's E flat Symphony, the "Fingal's Cave" Overture, Ferdinand Hiller's "Operette ohne Text," the Scherzo and Finale from Schumann's E flat Symphony; and Sullivan's graceful Water Music ("Henry VIII.").

CHEPSTOW.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert on the 13th ult. The first part was Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," in which the principal soloists were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Mr. J. W. Jakeway, and Mr. Ineson. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Richards conducted.

CHICHESTER.—The Musical Society gave, on the 5th ult., a performance of "Samson," with Madame Ada Patterson, Miss Emily Hinning, Mr. Jas. Gawthrop, and Mr. Magrath as soloists; Dr. Read conducting.

FENNY BENTLEY, DERBYSHIRE.—The first Festival of the Fenny Bentley and Tissington Choral Society took place in Bentley Church on the 13th ult. The Psalms were sung to chants by Barnby and Tutt, and the Service was Martin in D. The effect of these and of the hymns was greatly enhanced by the accompaniment of an orchestra of about twenty performers. For the Anthem, nearly the whole of Parts I. and II. of "The Messiah" were sung by a choir of about fifty voices. Mr. W. H. Tutt, upon whom had devolved the duty of training the choir, conducted.

GOSPORT.—The Portsmouth Amateur Orchestral Society's annual Concert, in aid of a local charity, on November 23, proved a decided success. The orchestra numbered fifty-six, under the leadership of Mr. M. Lewis. Miss Rawson was solo pianist, Mr. W. E. Churcher conducted, and Madame Kate Munns and Mr. E. Cook sang. The programme included Sterndale Bennett's Overture "Paradise and the Peri"; the Andante, Menuet, and Finale from Haydn's "Clock" Symphony; Kistler's Prelude to the third act of "Künihild" (which was very well received); two movements from Bennett's Concerto in F minor—the solo played by Miss Rawson; Grieg's beautiful melodies "Hyertesar" and "Varen" (for strings only); and Gounod's "Mireille" Overture.

LEAMINGTON.—A special Advent Service of Praise was held at St. Mark's Church, on the 14th ult., when the works performed included selections from Spohr's "Last Judgment," an Advent Song by George Kennett, and Dr. Garrett's cantata "The Two Advents." These works were exceedingly well executed by the capable choir of the church, under the bâton of Rev. W. Wale, with Mr. Geo. Kennett at the organ. The soli parts were well sustained by the choirboys, Mr. C. C. Smith, and Mr. W. E. Bloomfield. It was the first time Dr. Garrett's beautiful and musicianly cantata had been performed here, and its several numbers made a deep impression on a congregation that, from various causes, was unusually small.

MALVERN (VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA).—The Malvern Choral Society gave its sixth Subscription Concert on October 26, in the local Shire Hall, before a very large audience. The work presented for this Concert was Gade's "Crusaders," preceded by a short miscellaneous programme, which included two violin solos—Berceuse (H. Curtis) and a Mazurka of Wieniawski, played by Mr. H. Curtis; Mascheroni's "Ave Maria," sung by Miss Alice King, with pianoforte, organ, and violin accompaniment; and a song, "Patria" (Mattei), which was sung by Mr. R. Rofe. The chief interest was centred in the performance of the cantata, which at its conclusion was received by prolonged applause. The solo parts were well sustained by Miss Alice King, who sang the music allotted to Armida; Mr. A. J. Pallett and Mr. H. Rofe, who sang the music of Rinaldo and Peter the Hermit respectively. The choruses were well rendered, due attention being paid to the lights and shades of the work. The Society's pianist, Mr. J. P. Clarke, was a most efficient accompanist, and Mr. I. J. Hammond rendered good service at the organ. The work was conducted by Mr. J. Hasler. The next Concert will be given in December, and the programme will include Jensen's "Feast of Adonis."

PETERSHAM.—The annual Festival Choral Service at All Saints' Church was celebrated on All Saints' Day. Several choirs lent assistance, the number of singers altogether amounting to about 120, and the Anthem chosen was "I beheld, and lo!" by Sir George Elvey. Mr. W. T. Wood conducted, and Mr. Angus, the Organist of All Saints', presided at the organ.

SALISBURY.—The Sarum Choral Society made its first appearance this season at the Assembly Rooms, on the 13th ult., when the "Bride of Dunkerron" was the chief work presented. The solo vocalists, Miss Clare Powell, Mr. Chambers Coleman, and Mr. Arthur Barlow, did their share of the work with credit to themselves and gave general satisfaction. The miscellaneous selection which formed the second part of the programme, included the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, well played by Mr. F. L. Bartlett (who also led the band), with Miss Amy Aylward at the pianoforte. Mr. A. Aylward conducted in the greatly to be regretted absence of Mr. South.

TAUNTON.—An impressive special Service was held on the 14th ult. in the Temple Chapel. The music included Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and a portion of "The Messiah" most appropriate to the Advent season. The rendering of these works reflected great credit on Mr. Reginald Barnicott's choir-training, and the solos were effectively sung by Miss Barnicott, Mrs. Potter, Mr. Theo. Taylor, and Mr. Barnicott. Mr. Wesley Hammet presided with skill at the organ.

WALLINGTON.—The Musical Association conducted by Mr. G. F. Bruce began its sixth season at the Parish Hall on the 14th ult., when the first part of the programme was occupied by Romberg's "Lay of the Bell." The solos were sung by Miss Florence Monk, Mr. Edward Branscombe, Mr. Arthur Strugnell, and Mr. Phillips. In the miscellaneous second part two violin solos were played by Mr. Oswald Laston, jun.

WALTHAMSTOW.—The Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," at the Victoria Hall, on the 5th ult., before a large audience. The soloists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Adèle Kuhne, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Charles Ackermann (of Westminster Abbey). The orchestra, of nearly fifty performers, was led by Mr. H. Baynton. The Organist was Mr. A. W. Whitechurch, and the Conductor, Dr. J. Warriner.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. H. A. Hicks, Organist and Choirmaster to the Willesden Congregational Church.—Mr. Henry G. Alexander, Organist and Director of the Choir to the Church of St. Peter's, Bedford.—Mr. A. E. Davies, to St. James's, Curtain Road.—Mr. Fred. W. "Possesses a beautiful tenor voice, and his rendering of the opening Recit. and air at once established him in the good graces of his audience. This good impression was enhanced by his singing of 'But Thou did'st not leave' and 'Thou shalt break them.'"—Leamington Spa Courier, Dec. 16, 1893.

THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD (Psalm 23). A Choral Setting, without Solos.

BY N. KILBURN, MUS. B.

Price One Shilling.

"This work has already been favourably reviewed in these columns, and we are pleased to say that its performance more than justified the good opinion derived from a perusal of the score. It is a charming work, well written and effective, and should be taken up by choral societies in search of interesting novelties."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Written in modern style and enriched with skilful orchestration, this composition met with a full measure of success, and the composer was loudly recalled at the close. The chorus parts are scholarly and effective, and masterly examples of fugal writing are given. Altogether it is a work which resolutely speaks for itself, is capable of standing alone, and therefore must live."—Durham Chronicle.

"The first part finished with Mr. Kilburn's setting of the 23rd Psalm. This was the first complete performance of the work, and the audience were delighted with it."—Sunderland Echo.

"Mr. Kilburn's 23rd Psalm is a welcome addition to works available for Church Festival use; as there is a tendency at the present day to restore oratorio to its original home, choirmasters will find this work particularly suited to their needs."—Northern Echo.

REFLECTIONS UPON MUSICAL ART CONSIDERED IN ITS WIDER RELATIONS.

BY JOSEPH GODDARD.

The following are some of the points touched upon:—The importance to the composer of a feeling for elocution—The connection between inward hearing, fulness of storing capacity, and creative power—Why, of two effects similar in general form and constitution, one charms whilst the other does not—Why tunes wear out, whilst visual effect is ever fresh—Restriction of the sphere of music through natural conditions, the source of much of its power.

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

VOCAL SCORE, PAPER COVER, ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This composition is the work of a competent musician, and from beginning to end is full of reverent, tuneful, and appropriate music. We do not see how it could be better done. This Cantata ought to prove very acceptable for Lenten use in our churches."—Church Times.

"The 'Song of the Passion' is a simplified version of the sacred musical epic of which Bach's great Passion Music is the crown and glory."—Guardian.

"This Cantata will prove very useful, and well calculated for performance in a church or chapel; both music and words are of a devotional type."—Daily News.

"The various incidents of the Passion are pourtrayed in musical rhythm, majestic, solemn, or dramatic, as becomes the ever-changing scenes. The several sayings of the Saviour are prominent for beauty of treatment, and written for a tenor voice. The choruses are short, but vividly dramatic."—Bath Journal.

"Those in search of a new work for oratorio purposes during Lent should see Mr. W. S. Vinning's 'Song of the Passion.' The composer has given us an extremely melodious and sympathetic setting of the solemn subject, and one that is well within the reach of ordinary Church choirs. The scene 'In the Judgment Hall,' down to the cry 'Crucify Him,' is finely conceived and full of impetus."—Bayswater Chronicle.

"Though more suitable for Church use during Lent, this Cantata might be performed with good effect by an ordinary Choral Society. The work is well laid out, very melodious, and by no means difficult. No doubt it will be extensively used during the coming season, and will be found most useful where the immortal settings of the 'Passion' by Bach are too difficult."—Musical News.

"Mr. Shinn has the happy knack of writing popular music, which is at the same time thoroughly good and free from serious difficulties. This, his latest work, will find acceptance amongst Choral Societies and Church Choirs. The Choruses are bold and effective. The Solo writing is melodious and well suited to the words. The quartet 'Blessed are the dead' is really charming."—Nonconformist Musical Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but withal melodious, musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

BALLAD FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA
BY HERBERT HAM.

Price Fourpence.

"Where the ill-fated lovers take boat amidst the roaring of the tempest and tossing of the waters is the best section; the music here is graphic. The ballad is well worth the attention of our choral societies on the look-out for novelties."—Musical News.

"The workmanship is admirable. Not only is the part-writing very fine and the orchestration skilful, but throughout the piece the composer displays the power of producing great effects by comparatively simple means."—East Essex Times.

"The selection of the evening was a choral ballad, 'Lord Ullin's Daughter.' . . . It was rendered in a faultless manner, and round after round of applause greeted its performance."—Essex County Chronicle.

A. R. GAUL'S CANTATA

"UNA"

COMPOSED FOR AND PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1893.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction.—South-Western World."

"This composer sees no reason to change the method which has popularised his name wherever choral societies need music that is musicianly, melodious, and within the scope of moderate executive means. The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases. . . . The two orchestral numbers—an Introduction and an Intermezzo entitled 'Early morning in the woods'—are both in the gentle, flowing, and melodious style which seems the natural expression of Mr. Gaul's musical feeling."—Musical Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and suave part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Over the country there exist hundreds of choral associations who demand music within their means. For these Mr. Gaul has catered, and it only remains to inquire whether he has done his work well. This undoubtedly can be answered in the affirmative. The best appreciated numbers to-night were an 'Angelus' chorus, with bell accompaniment; a tenor ballad, a duet for the tenor and contralto, a soprano solo for Una, and a chorus of the forest people with waltz refrain."—Daily News.

"Where our townsman is mostly at home is in his charming flow of melody and effective and flowing choral writing. The whole work is from beginning to end replete with delicious passages, and will prove one of the best productions from his fertile pen. No one knows better than Mr. Gaul what is suitable and acceptable to choral societies and what the masses like. He writes for his people, and his success lies in that direction. We may safely predict for 'Una' a similar popularity to that accorded to 'The Holy City.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"Without doubt the Concert of Wednesday evening was the most popular feature of the whole Festival, for in addition to the attraction afforded by the appearance of M. Paderewski, the interest of the Norwich people was aroused to the fullest by the production of Mr. Gaul's 'Una,' a new work specially written for the occasion by a fellow-citizen by birth, and a distinguished musician as well. Every seat was occupied, and the audience included distinguished members of society, social and artistic, who, as the evening advanced, threw off all restraint and united together in giving a hearty East Anglican welcome to the Norwich musician and his artistic associate, M. Paderewski. The performance of Mr. Gaul's new work was a self-evident success. Mr. Gaul has his hand in a favourable position on the pulse of the public, and no one is better acquainted with the qualifications which go to make up a successful Cantata. The Angelus chorus made a lasting impression on its hearers, the introduction of the campanels (which were especially made for the occasion by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) giving a most picturesque colouring to the whole. The heartiness which marked the performance augured well for the future of the work, and was also shown in the reception given to Mr. Gaul at the conclusion, when he was heartily congratulated. Further evidence of the favour with which the Cantata is regarded may be inferred from the announcement that six performances of it have already been arranged."—Norfolk Chronicle and Norwich Gazette.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

"Very pleasing it is, abounding in smoothly-flowing passages, and there is no doubt at all but that it will become very popular with the smaller choral societies, for which the composer has done a great deal already, and thereby placed the musical world under an obligation which cannot be gainsaid. There are many steps to the temple of the Muses, and those who render assistance at the middle height do as great a service as those who chant pæans of praise at the summit."—Norwich Argus.

"Musicianly, melodious, and pleasing. Mr. Gaul has for a long time been well known, and has done good service to the divine art. This new work of his, 'Una,' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The general features of the work are those we have had occasion to notice before. Refinement and finish in the vocal writing, the accompaniment subordinated to the voices, whether solo or chorus; elegant part-writing, and well-rounded phrasing. The form is that of the classic school, before dramatic demands worked the revolution so conspicuous in the music of to-day. Mr. Gaul has apparently set himself limits he has no desire to overstep, but within those limits he moves with always increasing freedom; and the conviction is borne upon one that if he sought to be more ambitious he has the power to achieve his aim. . . . Distinguished by sound musicianship, if also with artistic restraint, and choral societies will heartily welcome this latest product of his pen."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"The pleasant and unaffected vein of melody noticeable in his 'Joan of Arc,' 'The Holy City,' and other works is evidently not exhausted. The Cantata may be heartily recommended to the notice of the innumerable smaller bodies which now flourish in every corner of the United Kingdom."—Standard.

"Is there not a definite mission for those who make good music possible without a London orchestra and expensive principals? I think there is."—Norfolk Daily Standard.

"Choral societies of moderate executive powers need a caterer able to supply them with pieces suited to their means, and they have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."—Daily Telegraph.

THE WATER LILY

A ROMANTIC LEGEND

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY

JOSEPH BENNETT

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Full Score and Wind Parts, MS. Vocal Score, Octavo, Paper Cover, 2s. 6d.
First Violin, 4s. 6d.; Second Violin, 4s.; Viola, 4s.; Violoncello and Double Bass, 6s.

THE TIMES.

Its constantly varied treatment is nearly always happy, and a series of brilliant musical pictures is submitted to the hearer, who may well feel almost overpowered by their number and quick succession.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The earlier and more supernatural scenes are treated with a wealth and delicacy of imagination for which we might look in vain elsewhere, whilst, amid the human interest of the final section, and especially at that impressive moment when the knights advance in order to touch the unconscious Princess, he shows that he can be strong as a composer of dramatic music. . . . I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Cowen, by his treatment of this scene, including the love duet, has made it his masterpiece. It is highly suggestive, and makes a very powerful appeal to the imagination.

STANDARD.

The "Water Lily" is the work of a consummate musician, and it is pervaded by an aroma of poetry highly gratifying to the artistic sense. . . . Produced under such favourable circumstances, the "Water Lily" has every chance of finding its way in due course into all the principal musical centres in the country.

DAILY NEWS.

. . . Mr. Cowen's orchestration is of an infinitely more important and finished a character than in "Sleeping Beauty," and the new Cantata contains some of his happiest melodic inspirations. Mr. Lloyd never sang a lovelier tenor song than his opening salutation to the face that has appeared from the Water Lily, and there is also much beauty in the dream music, which closes with the thoroughly English chorus, "Sing heigh, sing ho," taken from the opening of the Prologue.

MORNING POST.

There can be no question but that the composer has availed himself of his opportunities, and the "Water Lily" is undoubtedly entitled to rank high in the list of his compositions. . . . We do not think that his gifts have ever been exemplified to a greater extent than in the present Cantata. . . . One of its greatest charms lies in its perfect appropriateness to the subject. In dealing with so fantastic a tale Mr. Cowen is thoroughly in his element. He revels in the production of light and fanciful orchestral effects. His instrumentation is throughout admirable.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Whilst the musician's workmanship is highly commendable from the scientific standpoint—not one, perchance, for which the general public who will flock to hear this work cares much—it is thoroughly satisfying in other respects. No check is placed upon melody, whilst the orchestral accompaniment, though sufficiently descriptive to assist the imagination and embellish the incident in progress, does not draw attention from the vocalists. In other words, the instrumentation ably fulfils its proper function, and is therewith content.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The fanciful nature of the legend affords excellent scope for the exercise of Mr. Cowen's best abilities. He is an accomplished landscape painter, and the Prologue abounds in graceful and picturesque touches. There is also an appropriate suggestion of mystery and malignity in the instrumental introduction to Merlin's first utterances, while the music illustrative of the swift motion of the magical boat is quite in the composer's happiest vein.

ATHENÆUM.

"The Water Lily" is not only the most ambitious, but, on the whole, the most successful of Mr. Cowen's works of similar calibre. . . . There is an abundance of pure melody, and in the final love duet there is the ring of true passion, this climax being, perhaps, the most powerful piece of writing Mr. Cowen has yet given us. . . . In brief, "The Water Lily" is a remarkably clever and effective work, and well worthy the attention of our best choral societies, from whom alone it could receive justice.

SUNDAY TIMES.

As a whole, "The Water Lily" must inevitably command the admiration of cultured audiences, while, apart from its high poetic and musicianly qualities, it possesses many of the elements that tend to secure lasting popularity for a concert work of this kind. It is full to the brim of pleasing melody and ingenious device. Indeed, it may fairly be described as Mr. Cowen's masterpiece in the cantata form.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"The Water Lily" should certainly command attention wherever its merits, which are very great, can find proper attention.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

She is in all respects worthy to sing solo music for the best choral societies, and is a more able and accomplished artiste than some who are frequently so engaged. Miss Lee proved, by the fine style in which she sang her greatly varied songs, that she can sing any kind of music in the highest artistic and effective style."—Huddersfield Examiner, Nov. 3, 1893.

DEGREES IN MUSIC

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE

WITH A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF GRADUATES IN THAT FACULTY FROM THE YEAR 1463

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

Extract from Preface.

Thirty-three years have elapsed since the publication of the first English edition, and faithful to its original as that edition may have been in the main, it has been felt that closer adherence to the accepted standard text is attainable, and, as far as is at all practicable, should be attained. With this view the present edition is issued. The chorales, choruses, and solos have been newly and independently translated from the original German words, and the adaptation of the narrative of the Evangelist, a task rendered perhaps somewhat less difficult and hazardous by the aid of the Revised Version of the New Testament, has been carefully reconsidered and re-arranged so as to preserve unaltered, as far as may be, the musical text of the original.

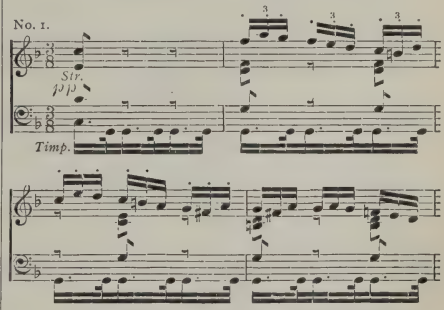
THE DRUM PARTS IN BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES.

The statement, often made, that "Beethoven was the first who elevated the drum from a mere noise-producing machine into an orchestral instrument," certainly goes beyond the mark, for, to say the least, it will assuredly be admitted that his predecessors, J. S. Bach, C. P. Emanuel Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, treated the drums in an artistic manner. That is to say, they frequently used them, not only for the purpose of reinforcing sound and rhythm, but also in an independent manner, regarding them as distinct from the Grosse Caisse, and as having definite and accurate sounds, which might serve not only as the bass, but also as the middle note of a chord or harmonic passage. But that Beethoven went far beyond his predecessors in the way of imparting independence to these instruments will readily be conceded. In analytical programme-books and elsewhere one has occasionally come across remarks on the peculiarity of Beethoven's drum parts, but, so far as we are aware, no attempt has been made to tabulate them. This, in a rough and ready manner, we now propose to do.

Of all musical instruments, the drum, said to be of Eastern origin, is probably, in some form or other, the most ancient. Indeed, if credence is to be given to Hans von Bülow, who, profanely parodying St. John, has stated that "in the beginning was the Rhythm"—thus giving the precedence to rhythm rather than to melody—the drum may be said to have furnished the primary basis of all music. Lully (1633-87) is stated to have been the first to employ it in artistic music, as a means of reinforcing the tutti parts in his overtures and choruses. Its introduction into England is said to be due to Handel, who employed a pair of kettle-drums—taken as part of the spoil at the battle of Dettingen—in the score of the Te Deum written by him in celebration of that event.

Beethoven has nowhere employed more than two drums, for, as was remarked by Berlioz—who, by-the-bye, used sixteen in his Requiem—it took seventy years to introduce a third drum into the orchestra. He has sometimes tuned them to other notes than the tonic and dominant, but never re-tunes in the course of a movement.

In his First Symphony he at once asserts the originality of his method of treating the drums by assigning, in the Andante, a passage to them which is rhythmically independent of any of the other instruments with which it is associated. And similar instances occur in its course:—



In the first movement of the "Eroica" two remarkable passages occur, in which the drum is treated enharmonically. First (E flat for D sharp)—

Secondly (B flat for A sharp)—

In the Coda of the Scherzo of the same Symphony occurs an instance of both drums being treated in a remarkably independent manner in the course of a moving "double pedal-point," as it might be termed—

No. 4.

In the poco andante of the Finale we find two instances of the drum being employed to sound a note which is foreign to the harmony of the passage in which it occurs. First—

No. 5.

Secondly—

No. 6.

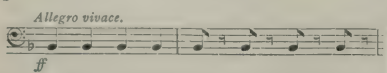
If we regard the context, this apparent irregularity may be accounted for by the fact that in each instance the inharmonious drum-note forms part of a broken or interrupted pedal-point.

Several instances of the drums being used enharmonically occur in the Fourth Symphony. We quote the following—

No. 7.

An instance of the minute and careful way in which Beethoven used the drums occurs in this Symphony, and similar examples are to be found in the Seventh Symphony. Here he writes—

No 8.



At first sight, considering the rapid pace at which this passage is played, one is inclined to question whether there is any perceptible difference of effect between the four crotchets and the four quavers followed by a quaver rest. The possibility of making this difference of effect fully apparent has been demonstrated to the present writer by Mr. J. A. Smith, one of our most accomplished and experienced tympanists, who, by "damping" with the left hand after each quaver, thus easily and unmistakably represents the quaver rests.

Attention is due to the following passage, one of the most remarkable in the whole range of Beethoven's Symphonies, and one in which the drum plays a prominent part. It is too long a one to quote in full, but will be easily brought to mind by reference to its beginning and ending. Commencing thus—it is continued in a similar vein during sixteen bars, and is thus brought to a close—

No. 9.

No. 10.

Here Beethoven, having at the beginning landed us on a chord of the sixth and fourth on the dominant, proceeds to resolve it in a manner which is quite opposed to rule and experience. This he effects, without the aid of the expected chord of the third and fifth, by dropping all the notes of the chord except the tonic, which he assigns to a roll of the drum extending through twenty-five bars, with an oft-repeated and modified melodic phrase superimposed upon it, leading in the end to a resumption of the principal subject of the movement. This passage has often been spoken of as a "pedal-point," but wrongly so, as Mr. F. Corder has pointed out in his article on "Pedal-point" in Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." He explains therein that it is not a "pedal-point" properly so-called, but merely a long-sustained note; for in a true "pedal" the harmony must be independent of the sustained note and occasionally alien to it. It furnishes us, however, with a salient example of Beethoven's fondness for anticipating the tonic and at the same time of retarding the re-entry of a principal subject, as if with the view of increasing the hearer's feelings of expectancy.

Attention need hardly be called to the drum solo—which occurs near the end of the slow movement of this Symphony. Beethoven's originality displayed here, and in a similar manner at the beginning of his Violin Concerto, has often been commented upon. It should, however, be borne in mind that this device had been anticipated by J. S. Bach, who commences his Christmas Cantata "Jauchzet, frohlocket, auf, preiset der Tag" in a similar manner. For the benefit of conductors it should be stated that, according to Berlioz, drum-sticks with sponge ends should be employed throughout this movement.

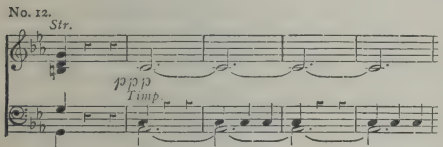
Towards the close of the Scherzo in the Fifth Symphony there occurs a most remarkable passage, extending through fifty bars, and throughout which the tonic (C) is reiterated by the drum. Quotation of its beginning, middle, and ending will suffice to call it to mind.

First—

No. 12.



Secondly—

No. 13.

Thirdly—

No. 14.

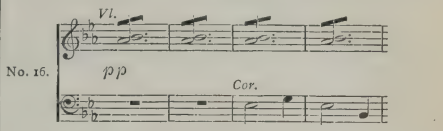
Commencing with a "deceptive" cadence on A flat (No. 12), the basses, in continuation, after oscillating between A flat, G, F sharp, G, and A flat, at last settle down on G (No. 13), thus with the drum forming a "double pedal-point," which subsequently (No. 14) leads to the Finale in C major. Here the tonic may be said to have been anticipated fifty bars before it was actually needed.

A shorter but similar example of this mode of procedure occurs later on in the same movement—

No. 15.

Before these instances of "anticipation," furnished by the fourth and fifth Symphonies, the much-disputed passage in the "Eroica"—

No. 16.



pales in importance, and however contrary to rule, may certainly be allowed to pass muster by reason of the ethereal beauty of its effect.

Throughout the Sixth Symphony ("Pastoral"), except in the "Storm" movement, the drums are kept silent; the intention doubtless being that in this they may burst upon the hearer with all the more effect of realism.

In the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies, so far as concerns the drums, there is little to notice beyond the fact that in more than one instance there is a divergence from the usual tonic and dominant tuning. Thus, in the Presto of the A major Symphony they are tuned in sixths (A and F), and in the Finale of the Eighth Symphony in octaves (F and F). The first of these instances gives rise to a somewhat curious inversion of the melody on the part of the drums—

No. 17.

In the Scherzo of the "Ninth" the drums are also tuned in octaves (F—F). About the middle of the first movement attention may be directed to a striking example of a "middle pedal-point" extending through thirty-eight bars. Towards the close of the Adagio we meet with several instances of both drums being employed simultaneously—i.e., in chords—the only examples, at least in the Symphonies, of Beethoven's having adopted such a mode of procedure.

It would be easy to adduce other proofs of the loving care which Beethoven bestowed upon his drums; but enough has been said to induce others, it is hoped, to go farther afield in their researches.

FROM MY STUDY.

In accordance with the promise given last month, I now proceed to draw upon my store of musical portraits. I was informed the other day, by a large dealer in such things, that comparatively few now pass through his hands. At no time, it seems, were they much sought for, and, except in very special cases, no large number of impressions were taken from the generally excellent plates produced by the engravers of the day. These prints have, of course, become fewer and fewer with lapse of years. All the more reason exists for making the most of those that remain in their original condition. In choosing from my albums some examples for reproduction, I shall be guided by the personal interest of the subject, preferring the portraits less known to those which the eye recognises as familiar.

Precedence is here given to a lithograph by J. Hayter, representing Weber in three positions, and published in 1826, the year of that master's visit to England; also of his death at Sir George Smart's residence in Great Portland Street. The occasion of Hayter's sketch was the performance of a selection from "Der Freyschütz" given at an Oratorio Concert in Covent Garden Theatre, on March 8. The scene is thus described in the memoir by the composer's son:—

"The public was all in evening dress. An utter stillness prevailed until Sir George Smart led the pale little man, dressed all in black, upon the stage, where the orchestra was situated. Then the whole house rose as one man. Thousands of British throats shouted a British homage to the modest foreigner. Men sprang on the benches to wave their hats; the women waved their handkerchiefs. For a full quarter of an hour the shouting continued, whilst Weber stood, with downcast eyes, paler than usual, holding convulsively to his desk and bowing from time to time in the midst of the tumultuous mass. It was long before he could raise his hand to give the signal to begin with a roll of paper he held in order to conduct in German fashion. Twelve pieces of his miserably crippled 'Der Freyschütz' were to be given for the first time (in England) in their true form. The overture and almost every one of the other pieces were encored. Braham sang the Max, Miss Paton the Agathe, with true artistic inspiration. The applause throughout was tremendous. The celebrated pianist, Moscheles, saw Weber after the Concert in the Green Room. He was sitting weak and exhausted, but smiling pleasantly, in the midst of a perfect mob of musical enthusiasts. He pressed the hand of Moscheles, and whispered him, 'Did they but know this at home!'"

Less than three months after Hayter's sketch was taken, Weber passed to "where, beyond these voices there is peace."

An early portrait of Madame Schumann cannot fail to be regarded with interest. The plate is undated, but the fac-simile signature shows that the drawing was made before Clara Wieck's marriage to Schumann and, therefore, prior to 1840, when the lady was twenty-one years old. The evidence of the costume points to the time of our Queen's accession as that when the portrait was taken, as does the mode of wearing the hair. But whatever the precise date, it is pleasant to look upon Clara Wieck as she was when her troth was pledged to Robert Schumann.

The portrait of Joseph Joachim is also undated, but the great violinist appears to have been about eighteen when the limner sketched his features. That would give 1849 as the year of the picture—five years after the artist's début in this country. The Semitic mould of the face was, apparently, more marked at that period than in later times.

Since giving, in a former paper, some particulars of the Bermondsey Spa and Gardens, together with the musical doings thereat, I have devoted a few leisure hours to obtaining information concerning other places of amusement once existing on the southern bank of the Thames. From the field of this research Vauxhall was excluded, for the sufficient reason that its history and character long ago became common property. But as much cannot be said of Cuper's Gardens and Finch's Grotto Gardens, to which attention will now be confined.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, a man named Boyard Cuper was in possession of a long and narrow meadow, or piece of garden ground, extending from the bank of the river, where now the southern abutment of Waterloo Bridge rests, nearly to the spot at present occupied by the church of St. John, opposite Waterloo Station. This meadow is represented, in a map of London dated 1682, as surrounded by water courses, and intersected by a path up the centre. In the course of his tenancy, Cuper laid out the strip of land as a pleasure garden, provided concerts, accommodation for dancing, &c., and succeeded in attracting a considerable amount of patronage. On Cuper's death he was succeeded by another person of the same name, probably his son, by whom the place was robbed of some among its attractions, notably a collection of ancient sculptures and fragments of sculptures once belonging to Arundel House, the Strand mansion of the Dukes of Norfolk. Cuper the second sold these marbles for £75 to two purchasers, one of whom was no less famous a personage than Mr. Edmund Waller, of Hall Barn, Beaconsfield. We get a glimpse of the Gardens, as they were in 1708, from Edward Hatton's "New View of London," published in that year. "Here," says the topographer, "are pleasant gardens and walks with bowling greens, &c., whither many of the westerly part of the town resort for diversion in the summer season. Near these stairs on the river, lies at anchor, excepting in the winter, The Royal Diversion, commonly called the Folly, perhaps from the foolish things there sometimes acted." Another authority describes the Royal Diversion as "a flat barge or raft, sustaining a wooden edifice with several apartments, large windows along the side, four turrets at the angles, and a platform on the top surrounded by a balustrade. The original design of it was to be a Musical Aquatic Summer House, and it was at first visited by persons of quality for both refreshment and pleasure, but its character appears to have been always equivocal, and it became at length . . . a receptacle for drinking and promiscuous dancing of the most dissolute persons. It was then suppressed by the magistrates; the vessel was suffered to fall into decay, and, at last, the materials of it were consumed for firewood." For a view of this aquatic music hall, refer to Wilkinson's "Londina Illustrata," Vol. I.

The Gardens did not so quickly go the way of the Folly, but entered upon the best part of their career when (1738) the following announcement was published in the Daily Advertiser: "Whereas Mr. Evans, who kept the Hercules Pillars, over against St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet St., as also Mr. Jones, the famous Harper, are removed to Cuper's Gardens, the other side of the water. They think proper to give this notice, hoping that Gentlemen and Ladies will honour them with their company. A very good Ordinary will be provided every Sunday. The Gardens are altered and made very commodious." Jones the Harper must be already known to some of my readers. Hawkins has this concerning him:—

Clara Wieck.

"Beside the Powells, there was at the same time in London a performer on the harp who merits to be had in remembrance; his name was Jones, a Welshman, and blind. The old Duchess of Marlborough would have retained him with a pension, but he would not endure confinement, and was engaged by one Evans, who kept a home-brewed ale-house of great resort, known by the sign of the Hercules Pillars, opposite Clifford's Inn Passage, in Fleet Street, and performed in a great room upstairs during the winter season. He played extempore voluntaries, fugues in the sonatas and concertos of Corelli, as also most of his solos and many of Mr. Handel's opera songs, with exquisite neatness and elegance. He also played on the violin, and on that instrument imitated so exactly the irregular intonation, mixed with sobs and pauses, of a Quaker's sermon that none could hear him and refrain from immoderate laughter. The man of the house dying, his widow took Cuper's Gardens, and erected therein an orchestra and organ, intending it as a place of entertainment for the summer evenings, like Vauxhall, with the addition of fireworks. It subsisted for four or five summers, but failing at length, Jones, who was supported by her all the time, was turned adrift, and, about the year 1738, or, very probably, several years later, died."

Hawkins is not strictly accurate in the foregoing paragraph. It has already appeared that "the man of the house" first took the Gardens, and we shall presently see that his widow carried them on, not for four or five summers only, but for thirteen years.

Evans opened the Gardens in June, 1739, charging sixpence for admission, and providing an entertainment which began at 4.30 o'clock and ended at 9 o'clock. His musical arrangements gave so little satisfaction, Jones, the harper, notwithstanding, that he issued, in August, the following advertisement: "This is to acquaint Gentlemen and Ladies that Ephraim Evans, at Cuper's Gardens, did not come to a resolution time enough to provide himself with good hands for his Concert, so thinks it is imposing on his friends to take money at their Entrance, since the Musick does not give the satisfaction he could wish; and the weather proving so bad he will only now keep a few of his best hands, and in some pieces Jones the Harper will join with them, and company will be admitted free. Care will be taken to keep out bad company, and everything sold at as reasonable a rate as before. I hope Gentlemen and Ladies will not think the worse on our lessening the expense, as we have no tickets out this season to help out in bad weather, which the best of them could not pay their expense without. From their humble servant, Ephraim Evans."

In 1740 the Gardens were "altered in a beautiful manner," and Evans announced, among other attractions, "a New Orchestra erected in a magnificent manner in the modern architecture, different from and superior to any other yet erected, with a fine large organ fixed therein by Mr. Bridge." In the same advertisement the following reassuring and significant passage occurs: "There is a back way leading from St. George's Fields, where proper attendance will be given, and due care taken for Watchmen to guard those who go over the fields late at night. And whereas numbers of persons have resorted last year by Water, and will probably this season, to the said Gardens; to prevent any irregularities or impositions on persons going to or from that place, for the future a person will be appointed to attend at Cuper's Stairs * from six o'clock till ten every evening during the said season, to put in execution the laws for the good order and regulation of the Watermen, and for the better accommodation of all persons passing by water, of which all Watermen are requir'd to take notice." The nature of the evils which the last-mentioned regulation was intended to remove may be gathered from the pages of "Humphrey Clinker." A party crosses by boat from Ranelagh to Vauxhall, and Miss Lydia Melford writes an account of the adventure to her dear friend, Miss Lœtitia Willis, of Gloucester. "The pleasure of this little excursion was, however, damped by my being sadly frighted at our landing, where there was a terrible confusion of wherries, and a crowd of people bawling, and swearing, and quarrelling; nay, a parcel of ugly-looking fellows came running into the water and laid hold on our boat with great violence to pull it ashore, nor would they quit their hold till my brother struck one of them over the head with his cane."

Evans died late in 1740 or early in 1741, and the Gardens were carried on, as already stated, by his widow, who seems to have been a capable woman. Under her rule music flourished, and to the fact that she advertised the programmes I am indebted for knowing what sort of music the patrons of this transpontine place of amusement preferred to hear. Were Cuper's Gardens now in existence they would every summer echo to some such classic effusions as "Come where the booze is cheaper." Let us see what Widow Evans presented to the public of 1741. Here is her advertisement for May 16:—

"To-morrow Evening, the 16th inst., will be performed a New grand Concerto for the Organ, by the author, Mr. Henry Burgess, jun.,* of whom it may be said without ostentation that he is of as promising a genius and as neat a performer as any of the age. . . . In a little time will be sung the favourite songs in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It,' Composed by the ingenious Mr. Arne."

A subsequent announcement states:

"Cuper's Gardens.—By desire of several Gentlemen and Ladies. This evening, being the 4th of July, will be perform'd the following Pieces of Music, viz.: The Overture in 'Saul,' with several grand Choruses, Composed by Mr. Handel; a new grand Concerto for the Organ, Composed and Perform'd by Mr. Henry Burgess, jun.; the Fifth of Mr. Handel's new Grand Concertos; a new Concerto for the French Horn, with Barberini's Minuet, Composed by Signor Hasse; the Eighth Concerto of Corelli; a Hautboy Concerto by Signor Hasse; 'Blow, blow, thou wintry wind,' and other songs, Composed by Mr. Arne. The whole to conclude with a new Grand Piece of Musick, an Original Composition by Mr. Handel, called 'Porto Bello.'"

Again:—

"Cuper's Gardens.—This is to acquaint all Gentlemen and Ladies that this present, the 18th inst. (July), will be performed several curious pieces of Musick composed by Mr. Handel, Sign. Hasse, Mr. Arne, Mr. Burgess, &c., in which will be introduced the celebrated Fire Musick as originally composed by Mr. Handel in the Opera of 'Attlanta' (sic) with great applause. . . . Note.—Having added to the Band of Musick several curious hands, the usual favourite pieces will likewise be performed, viz.: the Overture of 'Saul,' the Songs in 'As You Like It,' 'Blow, blow,' &c., and the Cuckoo, with the Choruses, & the new Organ Concerto," &c.

In 1743 the Gardens were to be "open'd for the Season with a good Band of Vocal and Instrumental Musick, which will be divided every evening into two Acts; the Vocal parts by Signora Sibilla. In the First Act this Evening she sings 'Powerful Guardians' in 'Alexander Balus,' Mr. Handel's, and 'Son le Donne Inamorate,' Signor Palma's. In the second Act, 'May Balmy Peace,' in Mr. Handel's 'Occasional Oratorio,' and 'Li Spuntan Vezzose,' in 'Mithridate,' Torredello's. The pieces of Musick in each Act will be selected from the best Composers."

In 1750 the Gardens were still open and giving the same kind of entertainment, the principal singers being Mrs. Sibilla Pinto (first wife of Thomas Pinto, the violinist, and probably the Signorina Sibilla already mentioned, though her real maiden name was Gronamann) and Master Mattocks, afterwards famous at Covent Garden Theatre. In these later years the Gardens appear to have degenerated into a scandalous haunt of vice, and when the Act of 25 George II., cap. 26, was passed, the magistrates refused a licence. Thereupon Widow Evans advertised that "having been denyed her former Liberty of opening her Gardens as usual, through the malicious representation of ill-meaning Persons, she therefore begs to acquaint the Public that she hath opened them as a Tavern until further notice." Between 1754 and 1759 the Gardens were sometimes used in the old manner, but a single concert in the last-named year brought their musical history to an end. In 1786 the site was acquired by Messrs. Beaufoy for their British wine manufactory, and in 1814 the present Waterloo Road was cut almost exactly through the centre of the once gay and dissipated pleasure grounds.

We marvel now-a-days at the sort of music which a miscellaneous audience in the reign of George II. preferred to hear, and we certainly question whether these days of "Daisy" and "O, Mr. Porter," show progress or retrogression. But there were grumblers even then. Smollett, for example, speaking through Matthew Bramble, Esquire, asks "What are the amusements at Ranelagh?" and answers himself: "One half of the company are following one another's tails, in an eternal circle, like asses in an olive mill, where they can neither discourse, distinguish, nor be distinguished; while the other half are drinking hot water under the denomination of tea, till nine or ten o'clock at night, to keep them awake for the rest of the evening. As for the orchestra, the vocal music especially, it is well for the performers that they cannot be heard distinctly."

The information now available with reference to Finch's Grotto Gardens is very incomplete, but they appear to have been established in succession to Cuper's Gardens. According to the evidence of an old waiter whom Mr. Wilkinson hunted up, they were comprised in a triangular piece of land on the western side of St. George's Street, Southwark. This land originally formed part of the extensive market gardens then existing in the locality, and was laid out by one Finch, a heraldic painter, who built a grotto over a medicinal spring which rose within the grounds. Finch made and decorated the Gardens after the common model, erected an orchestra, put up an organ (by Pike, of Bloomsbury), and built a large octagonal music-room, ornamented with paintings and festoons of flowers. Here, as elsewhere, therefore, music was a leading attraction.

Something may be gleaned from the advertisement columns of the daily journals as to the kind of music purveyed at Finch's Gardens. In 1764, announcement was made:—

* Grove's Dictionary does not mention this performer and composer.

"Finch's Grotto Gardens in George Street, St. George's Fields, Southwark, will continue open every Evening during this Season, with a Band of Vocal and Instrumental Musick. The Vocal Parts by a Young Lady, being the fourth time of her performance in public, with a Concerto on the Organ. The first Violin by Mr. Cocklin." Further advertisements show that some of the best singers of the day were engaged by Mr. Finch. We find the names of Baker, then a well-known professor of singing and the master of Miss Brown, afterwards the famous Mrs. Cargill; of Master Suett, who had not long left the choir of Westminster Abbey—a youth subsequently celebrated as Dick Suett, the actor; of Miss Thomas, a brilliant young artist who died all too soon for her art; and of Miss Snow, daughter of Jonathan Snow, Sergeant Trumpeter to George III., and, later, wife of Baddeley, the actor. The programmes included organ concertos, pieces for horns and clarinets, Handel's "Coronation" Anthem, Brewster's "Ode to Summer," choruses from many works, together with songs such as "Water parted," and "Swift wing'd vengeance," from Joah Bates's "Pharnaces."

On Finch's death his successor took down the grotto, rooted up some of the trees and shrubs, and turned the place into skittle grounds. The tavern, having been destroyed by fire in 1795, was rebuilt and a stone inserted between the windows, bearing the following inscription:

Here Herbs did grow
And Flowers sweet,
But now 'tis called
St. George's Street.

The appeal I made two months since for further information concerning James Ralph has been fruitful, and I am much indebted to Mr. T. W. Taphouse, who sends an extract from Dr. Drake's Essays, together with an original note of obvious value to bibliographers:—

"The Remembrancer. Mr. James Ralph, the author of this paper, and of many essays, in the Champion and Old England, was originally a schoolmaster at Philadelphia, in North America. He came over to England about the year 1728, and commenced an author by profession. He wrote in the London Journal, the Weekly Medley, &c., and by his industry and perseverance obtained the patronage of some individuals of considerable rank and influence. His ambition to become a poet, and his temerity in attacking his superiors in the Commonwealth of letters, at length introduced him to the honours of the Dunciad, where his poem, entitled Night, is not undeservedly satirized; he was immediately indebted, however, for his insertion among the dunces to some foolish lines entitled Sawney, an abusive satire on Swift, Gay, and Pope. He was likewise an unsuccessful votary of the Comic Muse, and attempted a still higher flight in what is termed a Pindaric Ode in blank verse, The Muse's Address to the King.* His prose compositions were, nevertheless, far from being despicable; and his 'History of England,' from the Revolution to the Restoration, in which he received the assistance of his patron, Lord Melcombe, and by whose advice, indeed, it was written, is a curious and valuable compilation. Ralph had frequently experienced the miseries attendant upon writing for bread; and his last production, a pamphlet, styled The case of Authors by Profession, 8vo, 1753, is composed with spirit and feeling; it enumerates all the bitter evils incident to an employment so precarious and so inadequately rewarded, and abounds in anecdote and entertainment. The Remembrancer was a weekly, undertaken a short time previous to the rebellion, to serve the purposes of Lord Melcombe's party, and in his lordship's diary Ralph is frequently mentioned with distinguished approbation."—Essays, Biographical, Critical, and Historical, illustrative of the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, by Nathan Drake, M.D. In two volumes. Vol. I., page 94.

I cannot find in Drake's essays any mention of Ralph being the author of either The Touchstone or The Taste of the Town. In Rose's Biographical Dictionary and Anonymous and Pseudonymous Literature, by Hackett and Lang, Ralph is stated to be the author of both works; but no one seems to have noted the fact that they are one and the same book, appearing under two different titles. I have a copy of both books in my library, have carefully compared them, and there is no difference whatever except in the titles.

T. W. Taphouse.

Ralph is twice mentioned in the "Dunciad," but one example will suffice:

Silence, ye wolves! while Ralph to Cynthia howls,
And makes night hideous—answer him, ye owls.

In Robert Carruther's Notes on Pope's poem it is stated that Ralph obtained a pension of £600 per annum for his political services, but enjoyed it only one year. He died at Chiswick in 1761.

EDVARD GRIEG.

The personality of Norway's most popular composer has been more than usually prominent of late. Some interesting details of his early life, told by himself, have appeared in our Danish contemporary, the Dagbladet; a long conversation between Grieg and the Rev. W. A. Gray, who met him in Norway, is related in last month's issue of the Woman at Home, and a most important critical article on Schumann, from his pen, appeared in the Century Magazine of the same date. It is not generally known that Grieg is of Scottish descent. These are his own words to Mr. Gray (it should be stated that he speaks English fluently):—

Alexander Greig, my great-grandfather, who afterwards changed his name to Grieg, emigrated from Fraserburgh last century. . . See, he said, displaying the seal at the end of his watch-chain, with the figure of a ship among stormy waves and the motto "At spes in fracta," here is our crest; it is the same as the Scotch Greigs.

His godmother, too, was Scotch—a Mrs. Stirling. We translate from the Dagbladet the interesting account of his youthful experiences:—

The first time I visited Copenhagen, I was a mere lad. That was in 1861. I was studying at the Leipzig Conservatoire at the time, and had received an invitation to visit a friend in Carlshamn. My route took me through Copenhagen. That town made a great impression on me. I had come abroad, and found myself suddenly in a foreign town, whose intellectual features reminded me in many respects of home. I knew scarcely anyone there with the exception of my genial fellow student from the Leipzig Conservatoire, Emil Horneman—a rather wild and unruly comrade, with a clear head and a warm heart.

Here is his account of his musical development:—

When I returned to Copenhagen some years later, I was crammed with Chopin, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Wagner, and felt a sort of craving to get elbow-room; to breathe a more individual and independent air. The name of Gade, too, lured me back to the North. I longed to become personally acquainted with the remarkable artist, who was able to give such clear and masterly expression to his ideas. On the other hand, I have never been his pupil, as is erroneously stated in several dictionaries of music.

At Copenhagen I met Nordraak, Horneman, and Gottfred Matthison-Hansen. You may be sure we wrote reams of music. There was no end to our compositions; we founded the Euterpe Musical Society, we instituted a revolution against the established coteries, we enjoyed ourselves in royal fashion. Those were splendid times. It was then, too, that I became engaged. My wife's family, as you know, is Danish. Her mother played comedy parts in the provinces under the name of Madame Wehrlich. She must have been fairly successful, for newspapers often styled her "the Frau Heiberg of the provinces." For my own part, I was glad at that time to take organist's work, and frequently took Gottfred Matthison-Hansen's place at the German Church in Kristianshaven. I was obliged to think of doing something for a livelihood, if I were to get married.

This is how he made the acquaintance of Gade, who, as the sequel shows, was destined to influence him considerably in the form of a stimulant:—

One day I had gone out with my friend Matthison-Hansen to Klampenborg. Suddenly he nudged my arm.

"What is it?" I said.

"Do you see that little man with the large grey hat?"

"I see him."

"Do you know who it is?" said he.

"I haven't the least idea."

"That's Gade." he said. "Shall I introduce you?"

And, without waiting for my reply, he took me up to the Professor with the curt announcement:

"Professor, a Norwegian friend of mine—a good musician!"

"Is it Nordraak?" asked Gade.

"No, it is Grieg," answered Matthison-Hansen.

"Oh, that's who it is," said Gade, scanning my insignificant and humble self from head to foot with a searching glance, while I stood, not without awe, face to face with the man whose works I treasured so highly. "Have you something to show me?"

"No," I answered. For the things I had finished didn't seem to me good enough.

"Then go home and write a Symphony," recommended Gade.

This was more easily said than done. At Leipzig I had learnt next to nothing of instrumentation. It is true I had once been advised there to write an overture as an exercise, but not a word was said as to how I should set about it. Gade's suggestion, however, had the effect of causing me to pull myself together and put all my energy into the accomplishment of the task which he had set me. Within a fortnight I had actually composed and orchestrated the first movement of my symphony. The whole symphony was completely scored, but has never been published in its entirety.* Old Lumbye conducted it one evening—I think it was in 1864—at a Symphony Concert at the Tivoli.

We worked hard all the winter at "The Euterpe," and in the spring I went to live at Rongsted. Whether it was the lovely situation or the invigorating air which inspired me, I won't pretend to say. At any rate, within eleven days I had composed my Sonata for the pianoforte, and very soon after my first Sonata for the violin. I took them both to Gade, who was living out at Klampenborg. He glanced through them with satisfaction, nodded, tapped me on the shoulder, and said:

"That's very nice indeed. Now we'll go over them carefully and look into all the seams."

So we climbed a small, steep staircase to Gade's studio, where he sat down at the grand pianoforte and played with absolute inspiration.

I had often been told that, when Gade was inspired, he drank copious draughts of water. That day the Professor emptied four large water-bottles.

Gade, however, wasn't always so good-humoured. When, for example, I brought him some time afterwards the score of my Overture for the pianoforte, "In Autumn," he shook his head:

"No, Grieg; that won't do. You must go home and write something better."

I was quite disheartened by this verdict. Soon after, however, I obtained an unexpected revenge. I arranged the Overture as a duet for the pianoforte, and sent it to Stockholm, where, just then, the Academy of Music had announced a prize for the best overture. I was awarded the prize by the judges, of whom Gade was one. He must either have forgotten the piece in the intervening time, or have been in a very bad temper on the day when I showed it him.

From which may be deduced the moral that the opinions of composers are not less fallible than those of critics.

Later on, in the summer, Grieg made his first public appearance in Copenhagen, and thus describes it:—

The occasion was a benefit performance on behalf of the sufferers from a fire in Drammen. I played then, for the first time, my Sonata for the violin in F major, with Franz Hildebrandt. Otto Zinck, who, as member of the Students' Choral Union, also took part in the Concert, asked if I wished my name to be on the programme. It evidently did not suit him to appear with a perfectly unknown "star."

"Of course I do," I can remember, was my reply. So my name was placed on the programme.

"Court-singer" Hansen gave his services as soloist in Nordraak's Chorus from "Sigurd Slembe." I must admit it went very badly, for Hansen scarcely ever came to the practices.

It was not until 1869 that I gave my first independent Concert at Copenhagen, when I really gained a success. I conducted on that occasion my Concerto for the pianoforte, which Neupert played magnificently.

"I like the Tuttis best," said my father-in-law, who was among the audience.

* The Andante and Minuet of this Symphony are published as Op. 14: "Deux Pièces Symphoniques."

The account of his connection with Björnsen and Ibsen—perhaps the most interesting part of the article, is as follows :—

In 1866 I travelled home to Kristiania, where I settled down as a teacher of music to earn my daily bread. I was also Conductor of the Musical Society. For the next three years I was thrown a great deal with Björnsen, who met my advances with extreme cordiality. When I had composed the music for "Before the Monastery" in "Arnljot Gelline," the easily inflammable Björnsen was beside himself with ecstasy.

He expressed a strong desire to write the libretto of an opera for me. Soon after I, was supplied, accordingly, with the first act of an opera, entitled "Olaf Trygvason," upon which I at once set vigorously to work. I have since published the first act as a concert-piece, for I never finished the opera—Björnsen shortly after abandoned great historical drama and took up "En Faillit" (A Bankruptcy)—a modern comedy.

For several years—however incredible it may sound—I avoided Björnsen, since he had thus left me in the lurch. Three years ago, however, we met on the occasion of the production of "Olaf Trygvason," in Kristiania. He was just the same—thick-set, winning, hearty as ever. No wonder that I forgot the old bitterness and grasped cordially his outstretched hand.

I have also had occasion to confer with Ibsen about a libretto for an opera.

In 1873 he wrote to me from Rome. I knew at once the precise handwriting, with slanting characters and eagerly tore open the envelope. The letter contained a proposal that I should write music for "Peer Gynt," which was to be produced at the Kristiania Theatre, under the bâton of Josephson.

We exchanged several letters on the subject. With reference to the scene with the saeter girls—which, strangely enough, I have never published, though I consider it the best of all my "Peer Gynt" music—Ibsen wrote as follows :—

"Make it what you like, but there must be devilry in the music."

In 1876 I met Ibsen in the Tyrol. He was extremely cordial to me.

"I really am most indebted to you for the 'Peer Gynt' music," he said. "I have had lying by me for several years the unfinished libretto of an opera called 'Olaf Liliekrands'" (the same theme which Gade has treated in "Elverskule"); "it was originally intended for another musician, but I would sooner give it to you than to anyone else. In a year's time it shall be finished and placed at your disposal." I have never seen or heard anything since about "Olaf Liliekrands." I have now given up all idea of writing operas. And yet, if I could only get a Norwegian fairy-story for subject treated à la "Bajadserne," I would be delighted to throw all my energies into such a task.

Here is a chance for librettists! We trust that the hint thrown out will not also be thrown away—one's imagination kindles at the prospect of an opera from so picturesque a pen.

In the interesting and beautiful revival of "Twelfth Night" at the Daly Theatre, incidental music bears a part as important as usual, if not more so. Yet not a single composer's name appears, so that the musical portions of the entertainment give rise to a sort of round game among the audience. Guesses are audibly made at the sources of the songs and catches, and of course Mascagni is credited with several of the better-known things that occur. All sorts of interpolations are made, mostly from somewhere else in Shakespeare. Thus the first act contains "Come unto these yellow sands" (of course in a version of Purcell's setting) and "Bid me discourse," in which Bishop's artless strains sound quite exotic, being accompanied on instruments of Indian or Persian shape, played more or less like mandolines. It is not stated who has written the settings of "O mistress mine" and the Clown's song at the end, here performed as a duet for Feste and Maria. The former, in which the text is sadly altered, has a really absurd piece of realism at the words "that can sing both high and low." The traditional music to "Hold thy peace, thou knave," is sung, and very well sung too; and it is not unsuitable to introduce, as a second catch, the once familiar work by Arne, "Which is the properest day to drink?" The third act, according to the arrangement of the scenes made for this performance, closes very prettily with a serenade sung by Orsino's minstrels outside Olivia's house. "Fair Olivia," as the song is called, is a cleverly adapted arrangement for chorus and solo of Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?" but the announcement that the song is "on sale at the theatre," reads a little oddly, since it gives the effect of the serenade having been specially composed. If Mr. Henry Widmer is responsible for the arrangement, he is to be congratulated very heartily upon the way he has fitted in the ritornels of the accompaniment to the voice parts. Would that we had now exhausted the musical part of the production! Apparently the attempt has been made to carry into effect the Duke's order in what used to be the opening lines of the play (now played in the second scene) :—

> If music be the food of love, play on;
> Give me excess of it, that surfeiting,
> The appetite may sicken, and so die

The effect of the incessant soft music, just heard plainly enough to make you strain your ear to follow its course, is most disturbing to musicians, and you feel inclined to cry, "Pray, stop, and let me hear the words!" Music is not wanted where the exquisite melody of Miss Rehan's voice is to be enjoyed, and every one of the few lines that are not accompanied is felt as a respite all too brief. For the quality of the music is not very high, nor, on the other hand, is it a mere indefinite tremolo such as used to harrow the feelings of the mob in the good old days of melodrama. If Mr. Daly would arrange for a musicians' Matinée, to be given without any music, or with only the sections mentioned in the programme, he would do good service to music and give a large number of more or less deserving persons keen pleasure.

The music expressly composed by M. Saint-Saëns for the recent revival of "Antigone," at the Théâtre Français, has just been published. That it will ever attain the popularity of Mendelssohn's to the same play is out of the question; but from an archæological point of view its interest is far greater. The brilliant intellectual gifts of the French master have never been more convincingly shown than in this work, which is, indeed, in some sort a tour de force. The problem he set himself was to compose music that should reproduce the tonality and, as far as we know it, the style of that used by the ancient Greeks in their tragic plays. The task, though rendered possible only by the patient investigations and discoveries of modern musical archæologists, is yet, for this very reason, far more difficult than it would have been, say, thirty years ago. Then, our knowledge of ancient music generally was not only inaccurate, but so slender that, though the composer attempting to reproduce its effects would have had little to guide him, he would, also, have had little to fear from criticism. Now, it is otherwise. With extended knowledge has come a limitation of the composer's freedom; and as for the quidnunc, he is so anxious to show that he knows his Westphal, his Gevaert, his Bourgault-Ducoudray, that he lies in wait—positively hoping for an anachronism.

M. Saint-Saëns has adhered to his self-imposed conditions in all respects save two. His modes are Greek as the groves of Academe or the Dialogues of Plato; his melodies are remarkable for stern simplicity, rugged strength, dignity, and a certain plaintive naïveté that is very touching; his choruses are written throughout in unison; and his orchestra is limited to flutes, oboes, clarinets (the Greeks used single and double reeds), and harps, with the addition of a few stringed instruments to sustain the melodic structure. This little orchestra plays for the most part in unison with the voices, but at times it is divided, and then one portion executes a counterpoint to the melody. In a short preface, M. Saint-Saëns justifies this proceeding on the authority of M. Gevaert; but it is obvious that he has gone far beyond the "rudimentary polyphony" which the learned Belgian theorist had in view when writing of Greek attempts in this direction. The other departure from a rigid adherence to antique forms is the fault of MM. Meurice and Vacquerie, the authors of the French version of Sophocles' play. Following Greek practice, M. Saint-Saëns has closely modelled his vocal melody on the prosody of the verses. The rhythm of this being modern rather than ancient, so naturally is that of the music. As regards thematic material, M. Saint-Saëns has utilised one or two of the few fragments of Greek music that have survived. One of these he speaks of in his preface as "borrowed from 'The Trojan Women' of Euripides; it is not by Euripides himself, but by a musician who worked with him, Euripides being, it appears, the first tragic poet who did not write music to his own plays." The piece in question is thus given:—

It is a pity the eminent French composer did not tell us where he obtained this precious relic. Without such information its authenticity is liable to be questioned. The fragment from a play of Euripides recently discovered is from the "Orestes," and has not the slightest resemblance to the above melody. Perhaps someone will explain.

The confusion that exists in this country as to the nomenclature of Intervals has vexed the souls of teachers, pupils, and examiners for many years. In these days of examinations the inconvenience arising from the use of many different names for the same things has reached the acute stage. We therefore gladly welcome an attempt that is being made by the editor of the School Music Review to obtain from leading musicians, and others concerned in preparing candidates for examinations, a consensus of opinion in favour of the use of one system of naming. For our own part, we should be glad if the proposal were to establish the nomenclature by which every scale-interval reckoned from a major keynote is termed major, thus excluding the terms perfect and imperfect, which may well be left to classify concords. But it seems hopeless to expect a general acceptance of this system. Even Sir John Stainer has abandoned it in the later editions of his "Harmony Primer." There is clearly much more hope for the system advocated by the School Music Review, because it is already extensively employed, and it is used in the text books of Macfarren, Prout, and others. It is as follows:—

Interval Nomenclature Recommended.

Read from below upwards.

Perfect Octave ..	C	D	E	F	G	A	B
Major 7th ..	B			E
Minor 7th ..		C	D		F	G	A
Major 6th ..	A	B		D	E
Minor 6th ..			C			F	G
Perfect 5th ..	G	A	B	C	D	E
(1)Augmented 4th or Tritone ..				(1)B			(2)F
(2)Diminished 5th ..
Perfect 4th ..	F	G	A		C	D	E
Major 3rd ..	E			A	B
Minor 3rd ..		F	G			C	D
Major 2nd ..	D	E		G	A	B
Minor 2nd ..			F				C
	C	D	E	F	G	A	B

Interval numbers wider than perfect or major to be called augmented, and interval numbers smaller or narrower than perfect or minor to be called diminished. The only names employed throughout on this system are (commencing at the smallest) diminished, minor, major, perfect, augmented. The terms rejected are "imperfect," "pluperfect," and "superfluous."

We understand that Sir John Stainer, Sir Joseph Barnby, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. F. Corder, Professor Stanford, Professor Niecks, the Academical Board of Trinity College (London), Dr. Westbrook, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, and many other examiners agree in recommending the above system for general adoption. We trust that other teachers and text-book writers will unite to make the system universally employed.

By the courtesy of Dr. F. J. Furnivall, we are enabled to quote the following quaint extract from his forthcoming volume in the Early-English Text Society's Series on the Curious Child Marriages (from three years to thirteen years old) in the Diocese of Chester. The italics represent marks of contraction in the MS.:—

"28 May, 1591. Agreement as to the Ownership of the Hautboys, Recorders, Cornets, and Violins of the City Waits.

A good deal of instructive and significant correspondence has been elicited in the pages of a leading evening paper by what it elegantly describes as L'affaire Coborn. A leading comedian of the music halls was hissed at the Palace Theatre of Varieties while singing one of his songs, and, after addressing a remonstrance to his interrupters, was dismissed by the management in consequence of his having infringed the rule forbidding any performer to make speeches from the stage. Other events have supervened which do not call for comment in these columns, but the correspondence in the Westminster Gazette is well worthy of study. To begin with, there was an interview with Mr. Charles Morton, the manager of the Palace Theatre, in which several remarkable admissions occur. "The majority of the songs which gain popularity now-a-days," said Mr. Morton, "are of a very low standard indeed. The only subjects that seem to be considered suitable for songs are 'Booze' and 'Women of no importance.'" The Westminster Gazette rather cruelly availed itself of the permission of Mr. Coborn's publishers to print the much-discussed song in its entirety. Perhaps the readers of The Musical Times will find the chorus sufficient—

Come where the booze is cheaper!
Come where the pots hold more!
Come where the boss is a bit of a joss;
Come to the pub next door!

As for the second class of song, we may, perhaps, be excused from reproducing the peculiarly revolting specimen quoted by Mr. Morton, who summed up the situation in the following pessimistic strain: "Of course there are periodical changes in the general tone of the songs, but so far as my experience goes, the change is simply from bad to worse, and I am afraid nothing better is to be looked for in the immediate future." Per contra we have Mr. Coborn saying that the song in question is a good song of its kind, and that he is absolutely on the side of the angels in singing it, while his publishers declare that "the song is mostly appreciated amongst the 'upper classes,' and that two-thirds of the vast number of copies sold have found their way into drawing-rooms." As to its being "low," Mr. Coborn repels the insinuation as "an impertinence."

Now, of course, "low" is a relative term. We are far from imputing to the chaste Muse of Mr. Coborn a capacity for sinking to such depths as were reached by the sailor of whom it is recorded that "he was expelled from a whaler for ungentlemanly conduct." But any one who has been at pains to wade through the text of "Come where the booze is cheaper" will find it hard to acquit the anonymous bard of flagrant imbecility and vulgarity. A morning paper, which specially devotes itself to catering for the needs of the masses—we refer to the Morning Leader—after declaring its cordial approval of all efforts to raise the level of music hall songs, gives utterance to the remarkable proposition that "it is really not the words of the song which matter much, and it is a mistake to attach too much importance to the effect they may possibly have on the minds or morals of those who listen to them." Now it is precisely this flabby laissez-faire attitude which is responsible for the state of affairs described by Mr. Morton. Although, as we observed above, this gentleman is inclined to take a pessimistic view of music hall songs in the immediate future, he did not despair of the possibility of amelioration, and when asked to suggest a remedy, replied: "What we want is to get really good writers to write songs for the music halls. I think a really good song, well written, would always 'take on,' and by degrees the popular taste might be improved." Here, at least, is a practical suggestion which it would be most interesting to see carried out. At the same time, it is rather discouraging to find that Mr. Kipling's "Barrack-room Ballads," several of which have been introduced at the music halls, have not attained to a tithe of the popularity enjoyed by ditties of the "Monte Carlo" order.

We are informed that Messrs. Novello are about to publish, if possible before Easter, a new pointed Psalter, to be called, from its most important feature, the Cathedral Paragraph Psalter, on which the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, of Westminster Abbey, has been at work for some considerable time past. The principle of pointing followed is that of the Cathedral Psalter, with slight modifications here and there, suggested by experience, in the treatment of individual verses. For the accents which are used in the Cathedral Psalter are substituted superimposed musical notes, an arrangement which is in course of application to the Cathedral Psalter itself. Other means also have been adopted to ensure clearness and promote facility. Prefixed to the new Psalter is a scheme of Chants and some brief notes on the history of the Psalter and the characteristics of each Psalm. As nearly simultaneously as may be will be published a revised and greatly enlarged edition of the Westminster Abbey Chant Book, in the preparation of which Dr. Bridge has been associated with Dr. Troutbeck. This edition will contain a full set of chants appropriate to the new Psalter—single, double, triple, and quadruple—many of them written for the collection by well-known composers.

The enormous success, throughout the country, of the Examinations instituted four years ago by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music should afford the liveliest satisfaction to all who take the slightest interest in the musical status of the British Empire. For this success means the gradual extinction of those trading concerns which are practically nothing but shops for the sale of certificates, diplomas, and alphabetical signs, and which have flourished on the ignorance and largely contributed to the bewilderment of the public. From a statement just issued it appears that in 1890, 904 candidates were examined at forty-six local centres, of whom 431 passed. In 1891, 1,519 candidates were examined, and 754 passed. This year the Local School Examinations were founded and no less than 190 heads of schools and teachers of music applied to be registered. 1,354 candidates were examined and 835 passed. In 1892 the number of candidates for both examinations reached a total of 3,617, of whom 2,179 were successful; and in 1893 the "passes" were 2,527 out of a total of 4,019. The number of candidates examined up to November last was 12,946.

It is now announced that the Board contemplates a further extension of its operations. The Local School Examinations have been found extremely valuable as a means of testing the efficiency of music teachers—especially in cases where the head of the school has little musical knowledge. It has therefore been thought desirable to organise a special department for examining and reporting en bloc on the general music teaching in schools registered on the books of the Board, but without granting individual certificates. Further, in compliance with a request from the University of Cape Town, an Examination of the music classes throughout the Colony has been undertaken by the Board, and a scheme for the extension of the Local Centre system to the Colonies generally is in contemplation. Nothing could be better. It is plain that the Associated Board is very much alive.

The Choir School connected with St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, has lately been completely reorganised by the Dean and Canons. The large and roomy school-house in which masters and boys now reside is situated in the Chapter Garden and contiguous to the Home Park, a special portion of which has been set apart as a reserved playground for the boys. There are twenty-four choristers who are elected by competition. For these a correct ear and good voice are indispensable, and it is of course expected that every candidate should at least know his notes. It is also essential that he should read well and articulate clearly. Twelve of the choristers are choral scholars, elected by the Chapter. The school fees for these scholars are reduced to £10 per annum. The next trial of voices for those boys whose parents wish them to enter the school after Easter will take place on Wednesday, March 28. Further information will be found in our advertisement columns.

We very much regret to hear that the Westmoreland County Council has declined to in any way subsidise music classes in accordance with their powers under the Technical Instruction Act. We believe that the Council ignores the subject of music on the ground that it is merely an "amusement." If this contention is sufficient, it is a practical condemnation of the teaching of singing in elementary schools, not to mention the uses of music in public worship. We hope the Council will be induced soon to take a broader view of their responsibilities, and that they will emulate the excellent example of their neighbours, the Cumberland Council, which has promoted an excellent scheme for popularising music.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

I have received from a trustworthy correspondent some curious particulars of a futile transaction between a clergyman and a gentleman who aspired to be his organist. It is unnecessary to mention names, the interest of the matter being not so much particular as general. Take the story simply as typical of a class, and, I fear, a large class.

A young organist wishing to improve his position as a teacher, and hearing of a vacant organ stool in a certain town, wrote to the Vicar, asking for information as to prospects of obtaining pupils there. The reverend gentleman replied that former organists had secured a satisfactory connection, and that he thought their successor might be equally fortunate. Upon this the applicant visited the town, played a service, and was offered the appointment, which he accepted. Shortly after his return home, he received a letter in which the Vicar laid down certain conditions. I must make a separate paragraph of an extract from that epistle, first stating that the salary offered was £20 per annum.

"You will kindly agree to play the organ when necessary at Divine service, also to conduct two choir practises (sic) in every week and to play the hymns, &c., at the Sunday School services. You will also promise to retain your office for at least one year, unless otherwise desired by the Vicar. Three months' notice of vacation of post to be given on either side. In consideration of receiving the names of several pupils, now or recently receiving instruction in music or singing, &c., you agree not to continue to remain in —— or the immediate neighbourhood as a teacher of music or organist, should you at any time cease to be organist of —— parish church, without the written consent of the Vicar. For the rest, I trust I may always find in you a pleasant and earnest co-worker. Former organists have rendered material help in the Sunday School, and I shall be glad if you will do the same."

If the foregoing be not an example of clerical sharp practice I do not know where to find one. See what the Vicar's conditions involve: Assuming two Sunday and one week-day services, we have, with the school service, the choir practices, and the Sunday School (say one session) a total of seven weekly engagements. The salary being at the rate of 7s. 10½d. per week, the organist would receive 1s. 1½d. per engagement! But perhaps I ought to leave the Sunday School session out of count, that being a free-will offering—at the request of the Vicar. The rate of payment is not all, nor is it the worst. The organist is to bind himself for a year certain, but the Vicar may dismiss him at any time, on giving three months' notice. Moreover, should the organist think proper to resign his post, he must also give up his teaching connection, and neither play an organ nor instruct a pupil in the town or its immediate neighbourhood, without the written consent of the Vicar. What does the reader think of these astonishing conditions (which I am glad to say the organist declined) and would he not, with me, like to hear the Vicar of —— preach from the text "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them"?

A correspondent informs me of having noticed in various papers during the month of November a report that Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" was about to be produced in Berlin and Coburg, and that the composer had gone to the Prussian capital for the purpose of superintending the final rehearsals. He adds: "But Sir Arthur has returned long ago, and yet I have noticed nothing further on the subject. Could you kindly inform me as to when the opera is to be produced, or whether the announcement was simply a hoax?" I have no information as to the matter in question, and it is just possible that the opera was produced when, owing to illness, I took very little notice of current events. Perhaps some reader of this paragraph will supply the answer desired.

"A Suburban Reporter" writes: "You have, times out of number, obtained a clear laugh at the expense of the provincial critic, and have even shown a laudable anxiety to improve his methods by exposing his faults. But why is it you refrain from holding up to scorn the farrago of nonsense constantly appearing in the —— (I suppress the name of the paper as not material)? Did such stuff appear in the Tooting Trumpeter the writer's scalp would be borne in triumph before the host who monthly read, with religious regularity, The Musical Times. Then why this silence because the paper is a London one? Is it due to professional etiquette? If so, then why not treat all alike? Or can it be that fear holds the sceptre?"

My correspondent is perfectly justified in writing as above, and, in acknowledgment thereof, I will allow him a peep behind the scenes. I have no time for looking up choice specimens of criticism, metropolitan or provincial, and the examples noticed in these columns are invariably forwarded by amused readers. With regard to the journal mentioned by "A Suburban Reporter," I am not a peruser of its pages, and, till now, nobody has sent me an extract from it. The cutting forwarded by my correspondent is a Popular Concert notice in which the writer says of Mr. Borwick that his "support of these Concerts is eminently important for their general value," and declares that the pianist's performance of a certain piece was "in its way, a perfect thing of its kind." Moreover, I learn that Grieg's Ballade in G minor is a "curiously unequal composition, containing in part that composer's best quality and, in part, all the defects of that quality. Spasmodic and irregular it is in any continuous movement, but in phrases its value is most emphatic." The writer goes on to describe oratorio as "this particular province of Handel's many manners," and he so much approves the rendering of a work by Mozart as to exclaim: "One thought to listen to the piece as it alighted cleanly and delicately in the composer's brain."

Yes, I am afraid to question these passages, because—I ought, no doubt, to make the confession with shame—I do not understand some of them. Here, it may be, is the "new criticism," with a special phraseology. Let me, at any rate, imitate the Bereans, and ponder well the question whether these things are so. I may add that the paragraphs dealing with curiosities of criticism are not intended to censure the writers, who do their best, so much as to shame proprietors and editors into the employment of properly qualified men.

With reference to orchestral instruments in connection with Divine service, a correspondent asks: "Do you mean the ordinary Church services, where you have canticles, Psalms, and hymns sung only, or the more elaborate occasional service, where you have anthems or portions of oratorios? If the former, would you mind saying how you suggest that the orchestra should be used, say as an accompaniment to the Psalms? What work would you give the cornet or the flute during a long recitation note, which often occurs in some verses of the Psalms?" I would certainly use the orchestra in ordinary services; employing it as an alternative to, and in conjunction with, the organ when hymns are sung, according as may seem best for expression; but, in chanting the Psalms, restricting it to the "Gloria Patri," as is done at the special services connected with the Festivals of the Three Choirs.

I note that Dvorák's new Symphony in E minor appears, among other interesting things, in the Philharmonic programme for the season now close at hand. This, presumably, is the work in which the Bohemian composer illustrates his idea of providing America with national music founded upon negro melodies. I have always regarded the idea in question as very far-fetched and, if the expression may be used, profoundly unscientific. National music is the natural musical utterance of a people's own feeling, and nothing else. You cannot fit a country with the article as you would put a coat on a man. It is a spontaneous growth. If, as say some prophets of evil, the teeming negro will eventually crowd out the Malthusian white, then Dr. Dvorák's prescription may serve; not otherwise.

By the way, I see in an American paper that Dvorák intends to renew his engagement at the Conservatorium over which he presides in New York. This is contrary to his first intention, which, as he assured me, was to reside in America only for the two years specified in his engagement, and then to return home with a full purse and leisure for composition. But the master has, doubtless, formed many friendships, and he may enjoy the active life of New York after the comparative sleepiness of Prague.

An Englishman, settled in Scranton (Pa.), sends some examples of the literary skill shown in American musical criticism, and gives some interesting particulars regarding the condition of the art in the town just named. "This is a large and prosperous town of 100,000 inhabitants, and, to show that it is not altogether devoid of some kind of musical enterprise, I may mention that two choirs of 250 voices each recently went from here to compete at the Chicago World's Fair £1,000 Choral Competition, one of the two choirs obtaining the prize. This state of things, however, is quite of recent growth, and would not have existed even now but for the efforts of two enthusiastic young Welsh musicians, who are but new-comers themselves."

My correspondent continues: "A month ago there was opened in this town a new Methodist Church, palatial and luxurious in the highest degree, costing £40,000, not including the organ, a lovely instrument, which cost £1,900 extra. In this church there is expended annually upon a professional organist and vocal quartet, £600. Can you credit it when I say that at the opening services—one month ago—the opening and offertory voluntaries were 'Home, sweet home' and 'In the sweet by and by'? Yet such is the case. The only hope I can see for the musical salvation of such a people is that a few subscribe to, and occasionally read The Musical Times, but even this the music dealers never trouble to deliver before about the 25th day of each month."

I gather from an advertisement forwarded by a correspondent that the affairs of St Mark's Church, Maidenhead, are controlled by the Guardians of the Cookham Union, which worthy and, as it appears, thrifty body are just now, or very recently have been, in want of an organist. The salary attached to the office is £5 per annum, with an allowance from the church funds which may, or may not, amount to as much more. Assuming that the church is, in effect, the Workhouse chapel, Mr. Gradgrind would probably agree with the Guardians that a £10 organist is good enough for the congregation.

A Concert notice which lately appeared in the Dorset and Somerset Standard is really too funny. Quite unable, as I am, to find epithets adequate to its drollery, I proceed to make certain extracts, without note or comment: "The attendance was so sparse one could not help arriving at the conclusion that, despite elegant speeches to the contrary, we have not evoluted to that point where we find pleasure in listening to such excerpts as," &c. "Miss —— and Miss —— gave the duet con moderato." "Miss —— has just that quantum of vivacity and spirituelle to warrant her budding into a first-class recitationist, and her winsomeness will be quite au fait when she arrives at 'sweet seventeen,' but de gustibus." "'The Better Land' was given con morbidezza by Miss ——." "Deacon's new song, 'Arab Love,' as essayed by Mr. —— struck us as metallic, and being evolved on the principle of magno voce minimo corpote."

Mr. Henry Knight sends some "Jubilee Rhymes for The Musical Times," to ignore which would be to waste very hearty enthusiasm. They may shock the modesty of the Editor of this journal, but I will run the risk:

Composers whose works are cacophonous crimes,
"Look out" when you "look in" The Musical Times.
Ye loungers who dream 'neath the shade of the limes,
Elysium find in The Musical Times.
Ye cranks from the land of the dollars and dimes,
What beats the world's record? The Musical Times.
Ye toilers who travail in tropical climes,
Revive, on perusing The Musical Times.
The poet, who penned these prophetical rhymes,
Prays hard for a place on The Musical Times.

Miss Janotha is a fortunate artist. She is now residing at Northwood Manor, lent to her by Mrs. Granville Ward, where she has eighty rooms from which to choose. Miss Janotha is also the recipient of a photograph and autograph note from the Princess of Wales, together with a large print of an Austrian artist from Princess Beatrice. I hear that a Mazurka from this lady's pen is to appear in the Girls' Own Paper.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Two performances have been given during the past month by the association which at present takes the lead among metropolitan choral societies, and the first, which took place on New Year's Day, was an occasion of more than usual interest. This remark may seem surprising as the Oratorio was Handel's "Messiah," especially as superfine writers on musical subjects profess to believe that the masterpiece of the great Anglo-Saxon composer is now rather out of date. The fact that the attendance was one of the largest ever recorded at the Albert Hall ought, however, to convince the most sceptical as to the abiding admiration for "The Messiah" felt by musical amateurs of every class. Without the least desire to disparage the excellent vocalists to whom the solos were allotted, it may be said that, with the exception of Madame Albani, their names could not be regarded as specially attractive. The Canadian soprano was in excellent voice, and of course rendered justice to such numbers as "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Madame Belle Cole was satisfactory in the contralto airs. The tenor music was sung by Mr. Philip Newbury with intelligence, but Mr. Plunket Greene seemed unwell, and this impression has since been confirmed by the announcement that he has taken a holiday for the benefit of his health. Though not at its full strength, Sir Joseph Barnby's choir was in fine order, and the audience was so delighted that not only was "For unto us" encored by acclamation, but a repetition was actually demanded of the "Hallelujah" Chorus, a mark of approval which the Conductor wisely declined to accept.

On the 18th ult. "The Golden Legend" was performed, and this most popular of choral works by contemporaneous composers drew as usual a numerous assemblage. The occasion was at least in one respect interesting, the young American soprano, Miss Esther Palliser, taking the important rôle of Elsie for the first time. After a little pardonable nervousness had worn off, Miss Palliser sang with much sweetness and sympathy, completely realising the idea of the gentle and self-sacrificing maiden. Of Miss Marian McKenzie as Ursula, Mr. Ben Davies as Prince Henry, and Mr. Andrew Black as Lucifer, it need only be said that they all sustained their respective reputations; but a special word of encouragement should be given to Mr. William Paull, who displayed an excellent voice and much artistic promise in the small part of the Forester. The choral portions of the work were superbly rendered, and the Evening Hymn was loudly re-demanded, but Sir Joseph Barnby was firm in refusing the request.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the fourth Concert, on the 11th ult., the Belgian violinist, Mr. César Thomson, who had not been heard in England, we believe, since he made his first appearance here at a Crystal Palace Concert in 1887, played an uninteresting Concerto by Goldmark, which we do not remember to have heard before, and most certainly do not wish to hear again. Through the medium of such an empty piece of music-making, no safe estimate of Mr. Thomson's powers as an interpretative artist, in the highest sense, could be formed; but his great executive skill and fine tone were, of course, instantly appreciated. He caused, indeed, quite a furore later on by his performance of Paganini's Variations on "Non più mesta"—a display of virtuosity that we rate at its full value, but which we should have preferred to hear elsewhere. The only piece played by Mr. Thomson worthy of inclusion in a Henschel programme was described as an "Adagio" by Bruch, and even that turned out to be an extract from a Concerto. In this beautiful piece Mr. Thomson showed qualities of a higher kind, which, on a future occasion will, we hope, be allowed to assert themselves in music of sterling worth. Two extracts from Wagner's "Ring"—never very satisfactory in a concert-room—opened and closed the programme, which also contained a piece the divine beauty and majesty of which made the rest of the evening's music seem even poorer than it was—that work which most of all typifies the "unfinished" life of its author—Schubert's Symphony in B minor. And yet a quarter of an hour after hearing this poem the audience was beside itself with excitement over the hairbreadth escapes of a clever fiddler from the pitfalls of Paganini!

THE BACH CHOIR.

Evidently the Queen's Hall in Langham Place is to be the new home of choral concerts in central London, for not only are the acoustic properties of the room specially good, but the public have already discovered the comfort and convenience of this beautiful building, despite errors in managerial details, which may be set down to inexperience and will therefore not be repeated when everything gets into working order. Bach was not represented at the first Concert this season of the Society which bears his name; but music should not be associated too closely with any age or any nationality, and as the revered Leipzig Cantor is to be represented at the next performance, on March 15, by his glorious St. Matthew Passion Music, which will be given with the original German text, the circumstance that modern art was solely honoured at the Concert on the 22nd ult., is not a subject for regret or censure. The first of the two items in the programme, on the 23rd ult., was a Mass in G by Professor Villiers Stanford (Op. 46), which bears on the flyleaf of the vocal score the words "To Thomas Wingham, in sincere regard, December, 1892." From the copious analytical description of the Mass we learn that it was composed at intervals during 1891 and 1892 especially for the Brompton Oratory, and was first given there on May 26 last year, the feast day of St. Philippo Neri, who in 1575 founded the Congregation of the Oratorians, and is generally regarded as the father of oratorio. Professor Stanford is far from being the first among gifted composers who, though not Roman Catholics, have found in the Mass suitable material for the exercise of their genius. The present example being intended for the purposes of public worship rather than concert-room performances, is necessarily written with conciseness, and even the fugal endings of the "Gloria in Excelsis" and the "Credo" are not subjected to much elaboration, though they are characterised by polished musicianship. Chastened expressiveness may, perhaps, be deemed the prevailing tendency throughout, though it is easy to point to features in which Professor Stanford has, in a measure, let himself go: the striking transitions of key towards the end of the "Kyrie," the curious insistence of the chord of G minor at the opening of the "Sanctus," the beautiful and almost Schubertian theme of the "Benedictus," and the charming and reposeful close of the "Agnus Dei," being instances in point. Four solo voices and four-part chorus are required, the two sections being much used antiphonally, with excellent effect. The performance, if not without flaw, was highly creditable, the principal vocal parts being well sustained by Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Marie Brema, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. Norman Salmond. The second scene from the first act of Wagner's wonderful music-drama "Parsifal" had been previously rendered by the Bach Choir, but not so impressively as on this occasion. Professor Stanford had evidently grasped the spirit of the music, the orchestra and chorus were fully equal to their duties, and Mr. David Bispham showed himself a Wagnerian artist of the first calibre in the important part of Amfortas. The audience sat as if spellbound, and, what is very rare in a London concert-room, no one stirred until the last chord had faded into silence.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

St. James's Hall presented a somewhat depressing appearance on Saturday afternoon, the 6th ult., when these performances were resumed after the Christmas recess, the inclemency of the weather being doubtless the cause of the many empty benches, as Beethoven's Septet was in the programme. This most tuneful of chamber works was delightfully rendered by Lady Hallé and Messrs. Gibson, Egerton, Paersch, Wotton, Piatti, and Reynolds. Rubinstein's little known Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violin (Op. 19) received perfect justice from Sir Charles and Lady Hallé. The themes of this work are noteworthy for melodic beauty, but the details are somewhat unsatisfactory. That Sir Charles Hallé is still one of the most artistic exponents of Beethoven's Sonatas was shown by his interpretation of the piquant example in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3). Mr. Eugène Oudin was unexceptionable in songs by Massenet, Chaminade, and F. Clay.

On the following Monday, Schumann's Octet was performed by the same executants as Beethoven's Septet, with the addition of Mr. Ries in the second violin part. The lovely work was given without break, and it has seldom, if ever, been heard to greater advantage. An interesting feature of the programme was a selection of four songs by the lamented Russian composer Tschaikowsky, in which Mr. Oudin showed himself equally commendable in German, French, and English words. Tschaikowsky was, at least, as much at home in penning lyrics as in the larger forms of composition, and two of these songs, "Gesegnet seid mir Wald" and "Russian Serenade," are gems in their way. Nothing else in the programme calls for remark.

The scheme of the 13th ult., and that of Monday, the 15th, may be dismissed with brevity. On the former occasion Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) opened the Concert, and an exceptionally fine performance of this masterly work was secured, with Mr. Leonard Borwick at the pianoforte. The gifted English pianist selected as his solo Grieg's Ballade in G minor (Op. 24), which consists of a series of fifteen variations on an old Norwegian air. They are clever, but not very distinctive of the Scandinavian composer. Mozart's lovely Quartet in D, known as No. 7, though it is really the twenty-fifth, was in the programme, and Mr. Norman Salmond gave much satisfaction in Handel's air from "Jephtha," "Pour forth no more," and in two Lieder by Schubert. At the next Concert Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Quartet in B flat (Op. 41), to which we referred last month, was repeated, and Miss Fanny Davies was heard at her best in Schumann's "Humoreske" (Op. 20), an appropriate title for a work which consists of a curious medley of themes, all of course interesting, as proceeding from Schumann, but strung together without any apparent plan. In the absence of Miss Lucille Hill, through illness, Madame Emily Squire sang airs by Lotti and Mendelssohn with much effect.

Schubert's Octet was repeated on Saturday, the 20th ult., with the same executants as on the previous occasion. Miss Ilona Eibenschütz and Mr. Piatti gave a very expressive reading of Mendelssohn's ever-fresh Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 58), and Miss Gwladys Wood showed conclusively that she has studied the art of vocal expression, in songs by Handel, Brahms, and Schumann.

The last performance that we can notice for the present was that of the 22nd ult., which happened to be the most interesting of the month. Johannes Brahms, who is by far the most gifted, if not the only worthy living representative of German classical music, has, perhaps owing to advancing age, confined himself recently to minor efforts; but even for these gratitude should be displayed while they continue to take the form of such small but exquisite gems for pianoforte solo as the series just published as Op. 118 and 119. The two books number in all ten pieces, and of these five were presented on the occasion now under notice by Miss Eibenschütz. From the first set she selected a Ballade and a Romanze, and from the second, two Intermezzi and a Rhapsodie. When such a master as Brahms speaks, music-lovers listen with reverence, although the utterances may at the first blush seem trifling. Not one of these new pieces is in length greater than an ordinary drawing-room sketch, but one and all display concentration of thought and a wealth of poetic feeling which entitle them to a place beside the minor efforts of Schumann in a similar direction. The Rhapsodie is the most ambitious and elaborate of the pieces given on this occasion, but the gem of the series appeared to be, on a first hearing, an Intermezzo in E minor, from Op. 119. As Miss Eibenschütz had studied the new Clavierstücke under the composer, and they were introduced to an English audience by her at his wish, they doubtless received full justice. They were cordially received, and, in response to persistent demands for more, the young artist gave the charming Berceuse from the set of pieces made public about a year ago. Schumann's beautiful but somewhat neglected Quartet in F (Op. 41, No. 2) headed the programme, and Beethoven's Septet brought it to a most effective conclusion. Miss Liza Lehmann sang a quaint song called "Rosalind's madrigal," by "A. L.," and Francis Thomé's "Fleur aimée," with so much success that she had to grant an encore in each instance.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Lectures on music have now an established place in the annual syllabus of discourses given in the theatre of the Royal Institution, where formerly gases and "isms" reigned supreme. This is well: well for the art of music, well for those who worship at its shrine, for that shrine will be all the brighter and worthier by now and again being illuminated by the analytical light of the Royal Institution. One hears much of popular taste, but it is apparently forgotten that popular taste is greatly formed by what we are taught. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Hubert Parry, Dr. Bridge, Mr. Dannreuther have each told what our musical faith and taste should be, and on the 20th ult. Mr. W. H. Cummings commenced a course of lectures on "English Schools of Musical Composition," a patriotic and inspiring title, since we have been so often assured that there never was an English school of music of any sort. Mr. Cummings, however, bids us think otherwise, and stoutly maintains that in the twilight of our history "England was the pioneer and exemplar of music to other nations." The remarkable canon "Sumer is icumen in," transcribed in 1226 for devotional purposes by the Reading Monk, John Fornsete, was adduced as a proof of long previous existing folk-music, destined to be driven out and absorbed by the subsequent introduction of the Church modes. Only that had come down to us which the Church had preserved and transmitted, and the Church had always looked askance at secular music as leading the mind to unprofitable associations. The Rota indicated the popular use of our present diatonic scale of F, the scale of the ancient Northumbrian bagpipe, which instrument also gave the two drone notes, F and C, found in the Rota. The construction of the canon also proved the attainment of a high development in part-singing not attained by other countries until centuries later. Moreover, the first attempts to harmonise the Church modes were made in England. The earliest known specimen of clavier music was that known as "The Carman's Whistle," while the works of William Byrde and John Bull fully maintained the priority of our position in the sixteenth century. In short, so earnest and convincing were Mr. Cummings's remarks that one left the theatre with a reverent esteem for the musical attainments of our ancient forefathers.

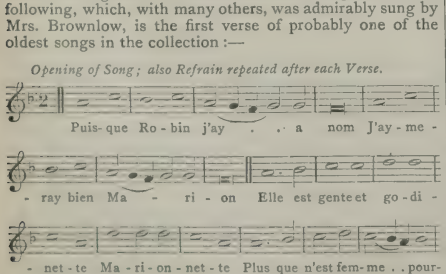
The illustrations to the Lecture were most effectively given by pupils of the Royal Normal School for the Blind and Mr. Norman Cummings.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

It is seldom a lady lecturer is heard at the eclectic meetings of the Musical Association, and, judging by the small attendance on the 9th ult., when Mrs. E. F. Brownlow read a paper on "Some French popular music of the fifteenth century," the "rough voice of man" possesses greater attraction for the members. Those, however, who assembled made acquaintance with a volume by Mr. Auguste Gevaert, which consists of transcriptions of a MS. to be found in the "Bibliothèque Nationale de France" (No. 12,744). This MS. contains 143 songs, the music for which is written at the bottom of the pages on two, three, and occasionally four and five-line staves, in the ordinary notation of the fifteenth century. Unfortunate circumstances had prevented Mrs. Brownlow examining the original MS., and Mr. Gevaert in his transcriptions had inserted here and there an accidental in accordance with the requirements of modern tonality—a proceeding that suggests such want of sympathy with the ancient music as to detract from the antiquarian value of his volume. The poetry indicates that the majority of the songs are of Norman origin. No less than thirty-four are found in another collection known as the MS. of Bayeux, and eleven in a collection known as the MS. de Vire, both now in the "Bibliothèque Nationale"; neither of these collections, however, contains music. Mr. Gevaert's volume gives eighteen of the melodies in the key of C and forty-five in F, those in the latter key being set to the words known to be the most ancient. Thirty-six of the melodies are written in the first "authentic" ecclesiastical mode and eighteen in the same mode transposed. The following, which, with many others, was admirably sung by Mrs. Brownlow, is the first verse of probably one of the oldest songs in the collection:—

Opening of Song; also Refrain repeated after each Verse.



Puis- que Ro - bin j'ay . . a nom J'ay - me -
- ray bien Ma - ri - on Elle est gente et go - di -
- net - te Ma - ri - on - net - te Plus que n'est fem - me . . pour -
- vray. Hav - vay plus que n'est fem - me pour - vray.

Forty-eight of the songs make use of the Da Capo, and several others have a refrain consisting of the opening musical phrase. The meeting was fortunate in securing on such an occasion Mr. W. H. Cummings as Chairman, who showed that it was impossible to fix the date of a melody without examination of the original parchment; and that contemporary writers could not be relied upon for the date or composer of a tune, "Sally in our Alley" being not sung, as commonly believed, to Carey's melody, but to one written 100 years before the song. Mr. Cummings also brought forward good evidence to show that the Church modes introduced into England drove out a far more beautiful music of the people. Mr. Gilbert Webb patriotically reminded the meeting that the first sign of re-awakening musical energy after the desolating influences of the fourteenth century was in England, as testified by the works of John Dunstable.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

Professor Bridge's Hilary series of Gresham Lectures, which were commenced on the 16th ult. in the Great Hall of the City of London School, attracted, as on former occasions, large audiences. In the opening Lecture, entitled "Early Essays in English Opera," the Professor went back to 1647, when stage plays with all entertainments consisting of music and dancing were forbidden by Act of Parliament. This formed a good although somewhat paradoxical starting-point, and the subsequent endeavours for the revival of stagecraft were interestingly traced. The first effort would seem to have been by Shirley in a play bearing the suggestive title of "Cupid and Death," for which music was provided by Locke, and which was produced before the Portuguese Ambassador in 1653. Three years afterwards a further approach to opera was made in an "Entertainment in Declamation and Music after the Manner of the Ancients," given by Sir William Davenant. The efforts of M. Grabu, the "Master of the Musick" to Charles II., and those of Banister were briefly referred to, and the discourse concluded with an account of our first English opera composer, Henry Purcell, and his operas "Dido and Æneas," "King Arthur," "Diocletian," and "Bonduca."

The second Lecture formed the third of a series entitled "On the road to the String Quartet," and the interest was chiefly centred in the examples played of the works of Allegri, Purcell, Corelli, and Caldara. Of these, perhaps the most interesting was a Quartet by the first-named, the first movement of which is constructed upon two separated and well-contrasted subjects, which are treated with some excellent points of imitation. The whole work is, moreover, more concise than the old fantasias and more refined in its modulations. Purcell's "Golden" Sonata was also played, and from the edition recently published by a German house, under the editorship of Gustave Jensen—an indication of how well this work is appreciated on the Continent. A beautiful Adagio in E, from a Sonata in A, by Caldara, also deserves mention.

At the third Lecture, entitled "An hour with Tartini," translations of some rare and interesting letters by this remarkable violinist were read, which showed him to be of a generous and grateful temperament and devoted to his pupils. In a letter written to his brother Domenico, from Prague, dated August 10, 1725, he says he has been ill and has "spent much money on medicines—dear, and of no use." In another, dated 1746, he speaks of his savings, "1,500 ducats in a box behind the door—the only safe way of keeping it, owing to the wars." The Professor also showed how much progress in the art of bowing was due to Tartini's improvements in the bow, specimens of a Corelli, Tartini, and modern bow, kindly lent by Messrs. Hill, being exhibited. The examples played of the master's music also showed a remarkable advance in musical expression.

The largest audience, amounting to nearly 1,000 in number, were attracted by the last Lecture, on the 19th ult., when the Professor explained his method of "Musical Gestures," by which the Westminster choirboys are taught the rudiments of music. The Professor gave an amusing account of how his idea originated in his experiences at a certain country church choir, which consisted of a few boys who scared rooks; an alto who was credited with having swallowed a whistle, from which his voice had never satisfactorily recovered; the village blacksmith, with a tenor voice as hard as his anvil; and a bass miller, who possessed five extremely low notes, to which the chants had to be fitted, and who produced a series of rumbling sounds not unlike the rolling of his own millstones; how the rook boys came and went, but the miller went on for ever, and how little real progress was made in spite of indefatigable efforts. The gestures, which were gone through with military precision by eighteen of the Westminster choristers, consist of an ingeniously devised series of movements which, by imitation, are associated with the various signs used in musical notation. The method embraces the construction of the scales and the explanation of compound time measures, the whole subject being treated and impressed with a clearness and rational association that effectually make "the rugged places plain" and remove all initial difficulties. Two other great advantages are also manifest—viz., the lessons can be given in the open air, and the movements provide healthy exercise at the same time that knowledge is gained in a manner that ensures remembrance. Descriptions of the gestures are unnecessary, as they are published in the series of Novello's Primers, but to everyone who has anything to do with choir training, or teaching children, they are invaluable, and there is little doubt this Gresham lecture will fulfil in a remarkable manner the desires of good old Sir Thomas Gresham, who was so solicitous for the perpetuation of "loving care to all good Learning, especially to Musicke, the earthly solace to man's Soule."

The examples at the first Lecture were sung by Mr. C. Ackerman, Mr. Fell, and choristers of Westminster Abbey, and the instrumental illustrations on the two following evenings admirably rendered by Miss Lilian Wright, Miss Dixon, and Messrs. Hopkinson, Hobday, and Werge, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Borland.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was opened at the Grand Hotel, Scarborough, on the 3rd ult. The proceedings were conducted in the large banqueting hall, which was quite filled with members.

The Mayor of Scarborough (Mr. C. L. Beeforth) occupied the chair, and, in welcoming the Society to the town, said that, although it lacked some of the resources of large places, they would find pure air, some of the finest coast scenery in the world, and the waves of the ocean laying their sweet cadence at their very feet.

Mr. E. Chadfield (the general secretary) submitted the annual report of the council, who claimed it as a matter of sincere congratulation that the Duke of Edinburgh, now also the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, had accepted the office of president. During the year, 428 new members had been elected out of a much larger number of applications for membership. New sections had been inaugurated as follows: Munster, Leinster, Ulster, Edinburgh, East and West Scotland, and Sussex and Mid-England. The finances were in a satisfactory state, and there was every reason to hope that under its present favourable conditions, and with its great and largely-increased influence, the Society would be able to succeed in realising many of the objects for which it was established. Indeed, it might now be fairly claimed that the musical profession was organised and placed upon a more solid basis, and it was attaining a higher level of artistic and social life through the instrumentality of the Society.

Mr. W. H. Cummings then gave an address on "Music printing, Ancient and Modern." Dealing with the subject of printed music, Mr. Cummings said that all music should be of a fairly large size—say, with a stave of not less than a centimetre in height—and he suggested other improvements, declaring that if music were printed on these lines much discomfort would be saved to many people, and serious injury to some. He advocated the discouragement of small-type editions, and spoke strongly in favour of the use of a bold-faced type.

In the course of the discussion which followed, Dr. Joseph Smith (Dublin) touched upon the causes which, he said, produced this small print. The one desire of the public seemed to be to obtain as much in quantity, size, or bulk as they possibly could for the immortal shilling.

A vote of thanks having been accorded Mr. Cummings, the Mayor vacated the chair in favour of Sir Joseph Barnby, who had during the sitting arrived in Scarborough from the West Riding.

Sir J. Barnby, who had a cordial reception, proceeded to deliver an address on "The Position of Music in England." He said that in 1869 only one elementary school in the kingdom claimed a grant of 4s. offered two years previously for having music taught. The next year forty-three out of the 12,000 obtained the grant, and from this meagre beginning the increase had been rapid and extensive, until now we had nearly four millions of children, principally under the age of fourteen, instructed at a cost to the body politic of about £165,000 annually. The efficiency of the teachers in this branch of their work had been greatly increased since the establishment of the training-schools, under the able inspection of Sir John Stainer. Passing on to refer to the study of music in the great public schools of England, Sir Joseph said that twenty-five years ago there was no music master at Eton. The art was not recognised there. If one of the boys wanted to learn music he had to take lessons in Windsor during play hours. From the time he went to Eton, eighteen years ago, to the time he left, eighteen months ago, never a year passed when the captain of the boat and the captain of the eleven—names to be spoken with great reverence—were not members of the Musical Society. He need not tell them what that meant in a great school. Matters were progressing at the public schools quite as much as in other directions. The Royal College of Music and other schools could give as good an education as could possibly be got anywhere abroad. That brought him to a crucial point. How long was it going to be considered necessary for young students, after they had been three or four years at English schools, to be sent abroad to finish their education? The question must be definitely put, Could we, or could we not, finish the technical education of students of music in this country? (Cries of "Yes.") He thought "Yes" too, and he felt very strongly about this. There was one thing which would be greatly to the benefit of any students after their technical education was complete. He referred to a travelling studentship, which would enable them to go round the Continent and see and hear all that could be seen and heard, to increase their experience. The general population, Sir Joseph went on to say, needed educating very much at the present time. There were many good professors of music, good players, good societies, and good orchestras, but they had not good audiences. It was most necessary that our audiences should be educated. In regard to choral societies, very little further improvement could be expected. The choral societies of England had reached a remarkable degree of excellence. The choral societies had done, and were doing, splendid work, and there was not a word to be said about them except that they should be increased in number wherever increase was possible. The state of affairs in regard to orchestras was somewhat different. In respect to our orchestras there was a little stigma to be borne. In a country like this where the distances between centres were so small, comparatively speaking, it ought to be possible to have orchestral performances almost weekly in the large towns. There was nothing of that sort at present. Let them be a little more catholic in their tastes, and not be narrow and keep themselves to oratorio work alone. Lastly, they had reason to congratulate themselves upon the fact that there had sprung up lately a small band of composers who would cover the country with credit. Sullivan, Mackenzie, Stanford, Parry, Cowen, and others. Fifty years ago such a roll-call would have been impossible. He would only say in conclusion that he deeply sympathised with all the aspirations of musicians. Music was of all the arts the one most charming and elevating, and tending to the cultivation of a proper state of feelings.

Mr. Walter Macfarren next gave an address on "The Origin and Development of the Pianoforte," with illustrations from the works of the principal pianoforte composers.

Nominations were received for the place of holding the next Conference from London, Dublin, Plymouth, and Cardiff, and the members decided in favour of Dublin.

At night the Mayor of Scarborough and Mrs. Beeforth gave an invitation reception at the Grand Hotel. The guests, including the members of the Society, numbered upwards of 800.

On the 4th Dr. Chas. Vincent presided, and delivered an address on "Part-singing in our homes." He said that a hurried glance at the condition of vocal music as practised in our homes at the present day would show that the exercise was still popular—perhaps never more so; and in some homes the character of the music was of a very high class and its performance most excellent. But the average character of the music in most of our homes and of its rendering was a matter for teachers of music to seriously reflect upon, and to direct their anxious attention to, for it was for the most part weak, poor, and inartistic. Frequently it was the teachers who were to blame, and it was therefore incumbent upon them to feel a responsibility when selecting music for their pupils. He protested against teaching so many pupils what was called solo singing, when what they, as teachers, ought to do was to direct their attention to vocal sight reading. In this respect we were far behind our countrymen in Queen Elizabeth's time.

Dr. Vincent's paper was followed by an exhaustive one on "Musical Form" by Mr. Prout, in which he expounded the views already expressed in his recent book on the subject. It would be quite impossible in a condensed report to deal fairly with Mr. Prout's masterly attempts to justify his adoption of Dr. Riemann's theories. If he failed to convince, the unsoundness of the theories themselves and not the manner of their presentation must be held responsible.

On the 5th Mr. D. W. Rootham, who presided at the morning meeting, read a paper on "Voice-training and its accessories." He stated that the requirements for a singer were more varied and more exacting than those in any other branch of the musical profession. The essentials for a public singer were a good voice, a good ear, a strong throat, a strong chest, and a physique that would stand daily study for at least three years. Too much was expected in too short a time, and he would urge the necessity of training gently. The teacher should direct the voice more from quality than from the compass. Mr. Thomas Chater read an instructive paper on "The Organs of the Voice," which led to an animated discussion. The general meeting of the Society, under the presidency of Mr. W. H. Cummings, and a banquet brought the Conference to a conclusion.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

On the 24th ult. an Orchestral Concert was given by the pupils in the Temporary Great Hall of the Imperial Institute, and attracted an extremely large audience. The programme was of unusual interest, as it included Dvorák's splendid Symphony in G (No. 4), a work which, on account of its wealth of melodic invention, originality of treatment, and superb orchestration, as well as by the peculiar fascination which the unrevealed secrets of its hidden "programme" exercise on the imagination, stands in the very front rank of modern Symphonies. It was capitally played and warmly received, the bewitching grace and haunting melodiousness of the Allegretto grazioso being, of course, especially to the taste of the audience. Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture and Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody were the other purely orchestral works. A very fair amount of justice was done to the latter, though the "Lassan" lacked breadth and dignity. Mr. Charles Draper played Weber's Clarinet Concerto in C minor with commendable purity of tone and fluency, and Miss Jessie Scott, a light soprano of considerable promise, and Mr. Albert Archdeacon were the vocalists. Professor Stanford conducted.

DEATH OF MR. HENRY C. LUNN.

We deeply regret to announce the death of Mr. H. C. Lunn, who was for many years the able and respected Editor of The Musical Times. The sad event took place on the 23rd ult.

Mr. Lunn, whose father, an officer in the Commissariat, served his country through the Crimean campaign, was born in 1817. At an early age he entered the Royal Academy of Music, and studied under Cipriani Potter and Charles Lucas. Although, in after-life, he published some vocal pieces and works for the pianoforte, it was not as a composer, or even as a professor, that he became best known. Mr. Lunn was marked out by the Providence which "shapes our ends" for distinction in musical literature, and possessed in adequate degree many of the necessary qualifications to that end. As a young man, he contributed to the Musical World, at once becoming favourably known by a series of papers entitled "Musings of a Musician," afterwards published in a separate form. This work went through several editions, and is that by which Mr Lunn's name will chiefly be preserved in musical bibliography. He was also the author of "The Elements of Music systematically explained" (1849) and "A Descriptive Essay on the Patent Clavic Attachment invented by Robert Brooks, Jun., showing its importance in facilitating performance on the Violin" (1845). That he contributed largely to the pages of this journal during the term of his editorship, which began in 1863 and ended in 1887, readers of The Musical Times very well know, for even when the authorship of his articles was not avowed, it could be recognised by any judge of style. Both in those papers and in "The Musings of a Musician," Mr. Lunn displayed a remarkably keen faculty of observation, and a quiet humour, unmixed with bitterness, that made him very pleasant reading. The same characteristics distinguished his criticisms, which, though decided, and occasionally tinged with irony, were always considerate and kind. For a series of years Mr. Lunn regularly attended the Festivals of the Three Choirs on behalf of this journal, writing full, accurate, and discriminating reports, still held in appreciative remembrance. As a teacher of his art Mr. Lunn had a quiet and useful career, attaining the highest honours which his Alma Mater could bestow; for not only did he serve as a Professor at the R.A.M., but helped to rule as a member of the Committee of Management and as a Director. In all his relations and in connection with every work to which he put the hand, Mr. Lunn kept free from the self-assertiveness of the age. He had opinions, and could express them very firmly; but no one ever heard him crying "Lo, here!" from the housetops. A quiet man, he loved a quiet life, and will be remembered as one of those who testify that such a life is often the most useful. As may be supposed, Mr. Lunn did not cultivate a large circle of friends, nor did he go much into society. Very congenial to such a nature must have been the peaceful retirement amid the amenities of which his few last years were spent:

> We sail the sea of life: a calm one finds,
> And one a tempest; and, the voyage o'er,
> Death is the quiet haven of us all.

Our late colleague has passed from calm to a deeper peace.

OBITUARY.

Mr. John Evans, whose death, at the age of sixty-six, causes a serious breach in the senior professorate of Liverpool. An excellent pianist and organist, as well as a Musician of exceptional all-round knowledge and one of the resident examiners to the Royal College of Music, his place will be difficult to fill.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:—

Benedikt Randhartinger, the doyen of Austrian musicians, at Vienna, on December 23, aged ninety-one. He wrote about 600 works, amongst which there are an opera, "König Enzio," twenty masses, sixty motets, several hundred songs, several symphonies, string quartets, &c. He was fond of boasting that he was the first who sang Schubert's songs in public. What is even more likely to perpetuate Randhartinger's name is the fact that he "was one of the very few friends—if not the only one—who visited Schubert in the terrible loneliness of his last illness."

Professor Adolf Fischer, director of the Silesian Conservatoire, at Breslau, on December 8, aged sixty-six. He was considered one of the best organ players in Germany, and was also the composer of some clever vocal and orchestral works.

Friedrich Lissmann, first bass ot the Hamburgh Opera, on the 5th ult., at Hamburgh, aged forty-five. At the performances of Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," at Covent Garden in 1892, he sang the part of Alberich. He was found dead in the street.

Theodor Lay, Court opera singer, on December 13, at Ober-Döbling, near Vienna, aged sixty-eight. For thirty-four years he was a greatly esteemed member of the Vienna Court Opera.

August Artaria, the head of the famous Vienna firm of music publishers, which published so many of the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c. He died at Graz, on December 14, aged eighty-seven.

Pius Richter, on December 18, at Vienna, aged seventy-five. In 1867 he became second Court organist, and when Hellmesberger retired, a few months ago, second Court conductor. To him belonged the honour of having given the first public performance in Vienna of Beethoven's Mass in D.

Eliza Wille, on December 23, at Mariafeld, near Zürich, aged eighty-four. The daughter of a Hamburg shipowner, Sloman, she was married in the thirties to Dr. Franz Wille, a journalist, who, after the political disturbances of 1848, went to Switzerland, where Wagner was living in exile. She became the firm friend, adviser, and financial helper of the great but impecunious and unpractical composer, and as such her name will live in the history of music.

Clementine Wieck, née Fechner, the widow of the famous pianoforte teacher, Friedrich Wieck, and stepmother of the latter's more famous daughter, Madame Clara Schumann. She died at Dresden on December 27, at an advanced age.

Josef Diem, on the 1st ult., at Constanz, aged fifty-seven. Up to his twentieth year he was a cowherd in Upper Bavaria, where his fine flute-playing attracted the attention of a rich and music-loving tourist, who sent him to the Munich Conservatoire. Diem soon developed into an excellent violoncello player and sterling artist, and for many years he was considered one of the best masters of his instrument on the Continent.

Julius Handrock, on the 5th ult., at Halle, aged sixty-three, esteemed teacher and composer. He wrote 112 works, mostly for the pianoforte. His death was terribly tragic. He was celebrating his silver wedding in the midst of his family, apparently in the best of health, and had just raised his glass to propose a toast, when he fell down dead.

Victor Schoelcher, the well-known French senator and statesman, on December 26, at Paris, aged ninety. In France he will be chiefly remembered by the successful anti-slavery movement which he started in 1829. During his exile in England he wrote a somewhat unsatisfactory "Life of Handel," which, strange to say, has never been published in the original French. Having become an enthusiastic admirer of the great Saxon giant, Schoelcher endeavoured, on his return to France, to create an interest in his idol's music and arrange performances of his works. He was, however, only partially successful. He presented to the Paris Conservatoire a splendid collection of musical instruments used by savages, and a well-stocked library of musical works.

Théodore Blangini, at Bordeaux, aged seventy-three. He was the composer of a number of operettas which were in considerable request in years gone by, both in Paris and in the provinces.

Charles Bérardi, at Lyons, aged forty-six. A baritone with a very fine voice, he created at the Paris Grand Opéra the part of the Bellringer in Paladilhe's "Patrie," and, at Bruxelles, that of Harald in Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

Otto Singer, a musician of much ability, at New York, aged sixty. Amongst his compositions are a symphony, a pianoforte concerto, a cantata, "The landing of the Pilgrim Fathers," a "Festival Ode," &c.

Mrs. William Boyle, the well-known amateur contra-bassist, in November last. By sedulously cultivating a natural musical talent, she had attained a high degree of proficiency in orchestral playing, her technique being remarkable for precision and refinement. Her striking appearance and the grace with which she handled her unwieldy instrument made her a conspicuous figure in the many orchestras with which she played, such as the Test Valley Orchestra, Lady Radnor's Band, and the Handel Society, where she was for several years the principal double-bass.

Mr. David John, on the 12th ult., at Trecynon, Aberdare; an old musician, whom the local papers refer to as the pioneer of music, and especially of choral societies, in Aberdare, to which town he came about the year 1850.

Miss Elizabeth Annie Nunn, on the 7th ult., at Fallowfield, Manchester, aged thirty-three, composer of a number of works, amongst which an "O Salutaris Hostia" and a Mass in C for soli, chorus, and orchestra (Op. 4) have appeared in print.

Armin Früh, in Nordhausen, royal music-director, composer, and teacher of singing. He was also for a number of years the musical critic of the Dresdener Nachrichten.

Madame Travisini, aged ninety-four, at Chinon, where, for more than thirty years, she had occupied the post of organist at the Parish Church of St. Etienne. She retired from her duties only about a year ago. She was the widow of an Italian musician, who was organist at Dijon Cathedral.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The holiday season has not been prolific here in genuine musical productions, yet we have not been, as in some past years, given over altogether to pantomime and ball. To Mr. Turner, of the Grand Theatre, a considerable share of credit is due for his enterprise in making an original and agreeable diversion at these times from the old-accepted state of things. As a singer he himself has become a great favourite here with a certain section of our musical public; while, as manager, with a well-selected company, he has been entertaining us now for some six or seven weeks, with a lengthy répertoire which has included a few very interesting "revivals" among the more popular examples of the operatic class. Of these we note in particular "The Daughter of the Regiment," "Fra Diavolo," "Rigoletto," "Sonnambula," "Nozze di Figaro," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Maritana," and "Bohemian Girl." Mention may be made of the very admirable efforts of Mr. John Ridding (bass), whose career as a Birmingham man has been watched here with great interest. The orchestra, though constituted of good players, has been defective in point of strength and completeness; but we presume that with a "low price" system the manager has been forced to practise economy. It seems, however, a pity that such a virtue should generally be exercised in this particular direction.

The Festival Choral Society was remarkably successful with its annual "Messiah" performance on Boxing Day. Every seat in the hall was taken, and in some cases enthusiastic listeners made themselves comfortable after a more or less Oriental fashion. The performance, under Mr. Stockley's direction, was a thoroughly good one. The principals consisted of Mesdames Hutchinson and L. Dews, Messrs. Iver McKay and J. Ridding.

A very enjoyable Concert was that given a little before Christmas, at the Midland Institute, for the "benefit" of Mr. Percy Stranders, a very capable local musician, who has unfortunately of late been prevented by illness from pursuing his profession. The bénéficiaire himself took part as pianist in the performance; his playing in a Concerto by Grieg was much admired and elicited loud applause. The programme, on the whole, was exceedingly interesting, and included some orchestral pieces given by the Amateur Orchestral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Langston.

The Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild, which had for some time been in a very moribund state, came to its dissolution in December last. The Guild, it seems, was not so badly off for funds, since it left about £115 in hand, but the meetings of late were very poorly attended. Many of its former members have now attached themselves to the Incorporated Society of Musicians, which has recently formed a new Section, with Birmingham for head-centre. Of this section ("The Midland") Mr. Oscar Pollack is secretary and Mr. Monteith Randell, treasurer.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Since Christmas the vocal and instrumental performances at the Bristol Industrial and Fine Arts Exhibition have been the most important music events, until the opening of the second portion of the season by the Madrigal Society's Concert on the 18th ult. Several famous military bands have played at the Exhibition with conspicuous success. During Christmas week music appropriate to the season was introduced, and a body of 100 picked voices, chosen chiefly from the Musical Festival Choir, sang carols on three different days. The list was as follows: "The first Nowell," "God rest you merry, gentlemen," "Good Christian men, rejoice," "The Wassail Song," "'Twas in the winter cold," "Sleep, Holy Babe," "New Prince, new pomp," and "The Manger Throne." Mr. D. W. Rootham, the Conductor, arranged accompaniments for the band. The singing was refined and expressive, and the effect of the support of the band was very good. Large assemblages gathered to listen to the carols, of which they showed their high appreciation by warm applause. During the first week in January four bands of local volunteers joined the Royal Artillery mounted band in the performance of several compositions. On the 13th and 17th ult., the Æolian Male-Voice Choir sang "Crabbed age and youth" (Stevens), "Peace to the souls" (Dr. Callcott), "The Martyrs of the Arena" (De Rille), and "The long day closes" (Sullivan), the two last-named having been chosen for a competition by male choirs at the Exhibition, which fell through. Under the direction of Mr. G. Slea they were intelligently rendered.

The chief event of the month was the annual Ladies' Night of the time-honoured and world-famous Bristol Madrigal Society, on the 18th ult. The programme contained several madrigals of the Tudor period, interspersed with compositions by modern writers—the two new ones, so far as the Society is concerned, being Villiers Stanford's "Phœbe" and "Sweet Love." Under the guidance of Mr. D. W. Rootham the pieces were sung with admirable results, as might have been expected considering the warm interest members of the Society and the Conductor take in rehearsing the compositions.

The second Concert of Keynsham Choral Society took place on the 4th ult., and, despite the severe weather, a good audience was present. The Society praiseworthily sang, under the direction of Mr. Fulford, Mendelssohn's "Loreley" (with Miss Florence Cromey as soloist); "O gladsome Light," from Sullivan's "Golden Legend"; and a number of carols. Songs were contributed by Miss Cromey, Miss Ada Cox, Mr. J. Northam, and Mr. Fancourt. Mr. Van Gelder played a couple of violoncello solos, and Miss Rose Thomas and Mr. Fulford a pianoforte duet.

The second annual Ladies' Night of the Clifton Amateur Orchestral Society took place on the 11th ult. The principal pieces performed were Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony (the Scherzo being omitted) and his "Son and Stranger" Overture, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" March, and Weber's "Oberon" Overture. Miss Bowden, Miss Parnell, and Mr. A. E. Masters were the vocalists. Mr. E. Pavey conducted.

Mr. E. R. Norris Mathews, City Librarian of Bristol, gave a Lecture on Mozart, at Weston-super-Mare, on the 15th ult. He played and Miss Florence Dawes sang illustrations from Mozart's music.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

It is very pleasant to be able to record the complete success of the Saturday Evening Popular Concerts. Messrs. Paterson's scheme seemed a very risky one, and Mr. Henschel's programmes, which aimed at a level as high as those of Subscription Concerts, were thought a serious addition to the risk. On the 6th ult. a good audience assembled to hear a Haydn Symphony and a Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. Móor, the young Hungarian composer. Herr Schönberger, the pianist, was warmly received, although he did not do the interesting composition full justice. The Concert closed with a thoroughly satisfactory performance of the orchestral numbers of Berlioz's "Faust."

Mr. Manns's orchestra made its best appearance this season on the 10th ult., when a delightful rendering of Beethoven's F major Symphony roused the enthusiasm of the audience. The Rákoczy March (Berlioz) was played with great fire, and Goldmark's "Springtime" Overture was a very agreeable novelty. Herr Franz Rummel was the pianist, and in Schumann's Concerto he showed sound and artistic qualities, which were so brilliantly displayed in a Liszt Fantasia that he was loudly encored. After the Concert Mr. Manns was entertained to supper in the Royal Hotel by the Edinburgh Society of Musicians, and, under the presidency of Mr. Hately, a very enjoyable evening was spent.

The fifth of Messrs. Paterson's Subscription Concerts was the best of the series so far as it has gone. The orchestra was in splendid form and answered every demand of Mr. Henschel as one man. The powerful "Egmont" Overture, the dainty B flat Symphony of Haydn, so full of nuances, and the lively "Merry Wives of Windsor" Overture had equal justice rendered them. The Finale of the Symphony was the neatest piece of orchestral playing we have heard for many a year. Mr. Max Pauer was the pianist, and justified his very warm reception by a most sympathetic rendering of Rubinstein's Second Concerto. His solos, Beethoven's Andante in F and a Concert-Study by Moszkowski, won him a hearty encore.

On the 15th ult. Mr. Franklin Peterson delivered a Lecture on "Verdi, the old and the new," before the members of the Philosophical Institution, in the Queen Street Hall. Vocal and instrumental illustrations by Mrs. Peterson and Miss Lichtenstein were much appreciated by a large audience.

Mr. F. T. Simpson gave a Concert of his own compositions, in the Queen Street Hall, on the 18th ult. A Pianoforte Sonata in F sharp minor (Mr. Della Torre), a Violin and Pianoforte Sonata (Mr. Colin Mackenzie and Mr. Della Torre), and some concerted and vocal music seemed duly appreciated by the large audience.

The Dundee Choral Union chose Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht" and Sullivan's "Golden Legend" for its first performance this season. The excellent level of performance which is the happy tradition of this Society was fully maintained, but the audience was not quite so large as usual. The soloists were Misses Ella Russell and Greta Williams, Messrs. Iver McKay and Watkin Mills. Mr. Carl D. Hamilton conducted.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

A record audience was drawn to St. Andrew's Hall on New Year's Day morning, when the Glasgow Choral Union gave its customary performance of Handel's "Messiah." Standing-room was even at a premium, so great was the demand for places, and, as usual, country visitors formed a large portion of the audience. The performance was an excellent all-round one, thanks to the careful direction of Mr. Joseph Bradley and to the admirable work of the soloists, Mesdames Clara Samuell and Sarah Berry, Messrs. Branscombe and Foli. In the evening the Hall was again filled to overflowing, when Mr. August Manns submitted a programme laid out on "popular" lines. But there is another side to this picture, for on the 2nd ult., and on subsequent occasions, the audiences were far from satisfactory, due, without the shadow of a doubt, to the congested state of matters orchestral here just at present. Neither have good houses been secured by the Scottish Orchestra Company, all of which is significant, and a forecast of results, financial and otherwise, would not be a difficult calculation. Schumann's Symphony (No. 1) in B flat found a place in Mr. Manns's programme on the 4th ult., as also Mr. Godfrey Pringle's orchestral ballad "Durand," a composition of much promise, and Mr. César Thomson played—but hardly in his best style—Beethoven's Violin Concerto. At the fifth Saturday Popular Concert the Belgian violinist again appeared, when he received an ovation by reason of his brilliant achievements in a lighter class of music than he has hitherto essayed here. Another furore was created at the Choral Union Classical Concert on the 9th ult., the first favourite on this occasion being Mr. Franz Rummel, who played in superb fashion Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia (No. 14). The band was in remarkably fine order throughout the evening, and it may, indeed, be doubted if Mr. Manns has ever directed here a finer series of performances. "The Messiah" was repeated, in the City Hall, on the 12th ult., in presence of an enormous audience, and on the following evening Mr. Andrew Black, Glasgow's own baritone, sang at the Popular Concert with his customary success. He again won high favour on the 16th ult., when he was ably associated with Misses Ella Russell and Chamberlain and Messrs. Hedmondt and Grice in what was, in many respects, a brilliant recital of the second and third acts of "The Flying Dutchman." The Choral Union was fully equal to Wagner's demands, and, as the work had not been performed on the local operatic stage for a great many years, the enterprise of the Society merited warm commendation. Mr. Bradley conducted with conspicuous ability, and if the band was at times aggressive that was not the fault of the popular chorus-master.

The Scottish Orchestra Company had an excellent holiday programme on the morning of the 1st ult., with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony as its chief attraction. Here Mr. Henschel's band was at its best, an artistic success which has oft and again been achieved during the last month. Special interest centred in the sixth Classical Concert of the Company, inasmuch as Dr. Villiers Stanford came North to conduct his music to Lord Tennyson's "Becket," provided for the recent Lyceum production. It can hardly be said that this music is so interesting on the concert platform as when associated with the play, but the novelty was, nevertheless, very welcome, and the success of the Concert was enhanced by the fine singing of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. Miss Fanny Davies, the pianist of the evening, surpassed herself in Chopin's F minor Concerto. A novelty was announced for the 22nd ult.—Dr. Hubert Parry's "Hypatia" music, under the direction of the accomplished composer himself. Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the vocalist, and the programme included Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolan," Haydn's Symphony in C (No. 7), and an orchestral selection from Berlioz's "Faust." The services of Dr. Joachim were secured for the Concert on the 31st ult.

The Chamber Concert, on the 11th ult., under the auspices of the Company, was but poorly attended, showing again, it is to be feared, that the string quartet and kindred works do not appeal to Glasgow audiences. The programme contained Beethoven's Septet and Brahms's B flat major Quartet (Op. 67), each piece being an artistic triumph of primary import. At the Company's sixth Popular Concert Mr. Moor's new and somewhat ambitious Concerto was accorded a hearing. Herr Schönberger played the pianoforte part like the excellent artist he is, and in Beethoven's Symphony (No. 7) Mr. Henschel and his orchestra again scored a big success. Miss Marie Brema sang, and very soon gave evidence of a further artistic development in her voice and method.

The Paisley folks have reason to be proud of their Choral Union, an organisation which Mr. James Barr, an amateur of exceptional attainments, has conducted with remarkable skill for many years. The Society takes, indeed, high rank amongst provincial choirs, and it more than sustained its reputation on the evening of the 11th ult., when Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given, with the assistance of a band of forty instrumentalists from the Glasgow Choral Union orchestra. The Misses Medora Henson and Jennie Rankin, Messrs. Branscombe and Hughes sang the solos admirably, and Mr. James Pattinson had safe charge of the organ accompaniment.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A very fine performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony sustained the credit of the Philharmonic Society at the initial Concert of the present half-session on the 9th ult., but the rest of the programme contained nothing worthy of special note except the playing of Saint-Saëns's Concerto (No. 2) in G minor, by Mr. Leonard Borwick. Another Concert of the miscellaneous order followed on the 21st ult., with Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony as the leading feature.

Bare allusion was made in last month's summary of local events to the performance of Handel's "Messiah" by the Musical Society, for the reason that it fell so late in December. It is not out of place, therefore, to add to the former brief record at the present date, especially as the event in question deserves more than passing comment. Not for very many years past, to say the least, has so fine a chorus been heard in Liverpool, and if its members maintain cohesion, the future of the organisation should be big with possibilities. The numerical strength of the choristers was not over-commensurate with the breadth and volume of tone, while the attack and all else concerning the question of effect was on a fair level with the note-perfect rendering of the choral portions of the work. The weak feature of the whole was the band, and if the Society is to fulfil its proper destiny, this must be looked to in the immediate future, especially in view of the fact that Mendelssohn's "Elijah" is to be the next production, under the bâton of Mr. D. O. Parry.

The regular season of opera, instituted too many years ago to count by the late Carl Rosa, was inaugurated on the 1st ult. with a performance of Gounod's "Faust." In unbroken succession, evening by evening, at the Royal Court Theatre, Her Majesty's servants, as the Company now style themselves, have since given Verdi's "Aïda" and "Trovatore," Wagner's "Tannhäuser," Gluck's "Orpheus," Donizetti's "Adina" and "Daughter of the Regiment" ("L'elisire d'amore"), Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci," Mascagni's "Rustic Chivalry," Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," and Wallace's "Maritana," a truly compendious selection, besides other works which may have escaped the memory. The first actual novelty was heard on the 13th ult., when Bernicat and Messager's "Fanchette" was produced. The music is bright and ear-tickling in character, the story funny enough, and the general performance was capital.

The Sunday Society has devoted two Orchestral Concerts to the works of Gounod and Wagner respectively, and it is a healthy sign of the times that so high an educational musical movement should have taken such firm hold on the thousands of people who attend these Concerts in St. George's Hall. A selection from the "St. Cecilia" Mass of the first-named writer was given on the one occasion, and on the other excerpts from the latter composer's "Rienzi," "Lohengrin," "Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhäuser." The regular orchestra, which is registered at fifty strong, was on each occasion considerably augmented.

There has been but little going on in the way of ordinary music during the past month, opera and pantomime having had the field well nigh exclusively to themselves. Mr. T. Shaw's Ballad Concerts, at Hope Hall, have taken a firmer hold on the section of the public who love such things than any recently exploited venture. At Birkenhead the subscription series of a similar order are pursuing their usual career. The admirable Schiever Quartet Concerts at the Art Club were resumed on the 20th ult., proving, as is their wont, one of the most delightful factors in all our winter's music. The Societa Armonica and Orchestral Society are again in harness.

At Hawarden, Bennett's "May Queen" was given on the 15th ult., Mr. Herbert Gladstone singing one of the parts. At Chester, Sir Charles and Lady Hallé have given a Recital, but there appears to have been but little else of a noteworthy character doing in the Cestrian capital. At Liscard Gade's fine cantata "The Crusaders," together with the same writer's melodious "Spring's Message," have been put in rehearsal for the next Concert. At Rock Ferry Mendelssohn's "Elijah" is placed in rehearsal by the old established Choral Society. At Warrington, Gounod's "St. Cecilia" Mass; at Frodsham, Gaul's "Joan of Arc," and at Runcorn, Gounod's "By the Waters of Babylon," and other miscellaneous pieces, are in rehearsal.

Mr. Best's Recitals at St. George's Hall have been interspersed on Sundays—these alternating with the Concerts of the Sunday Society—with performances by Mr. H. Grimshaw and Mr. I. H. Stammers. A very popular series of Sunday afternoons, for men only, was some time ago instituted at what is generally known as Dr. Raffle's Chapel, one of the leading dissenting places of worship in the city.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

In the programme of his last Concert in 1893 Sir Charles Hallé found room for two English orchestral works, but of very different calibre. The "Scandinavian" Symphony of Mr. Cowen had not been given since 1881; and Balfe's Introduction to the "Bohemian Girl" since 1862. The latter piece played out the scant remainder of the audience which had crowded to listen to Madame Albani; and the opening of the former was somewhat marred by the late arrivals. But it was enjoyed, and led to an increased desire to hear the "Welsh" Symphony, and other works by its author not yet produced here. The Concert was pleasant, but nothing in it was more exciting than the rendering by Mr. Willy Hess of Ernst's "Allegro Pathétique" and the Ballad and Polonaise of Vieuxtemps; after which the talented violinist was thrice recalled. At the first Concert in the New Year the "Faust" of Berlioz was given, with Mrs. and Mr. Henschel, Messrs. E. Lloyd and A. S. Kinnell. In no work does our practised orchestra show to such advantage or Mr. Wilson's choir display more spirit and delight, and the enthusiastic audience proved that its annual performance has not yet decreased its attraction. In Beethoven's C minor Concerto, on the 11th ult., Sir Charles played with all the delicacy which, in 1848, first gained the admiration of the Manchester amateurs; Miss Thudicum introduced a very interesting "Ave Maria" by Luigi Luzzi; and Spohr's Notturno (Op. 34), for wind, cymbals, and drums, had some of the charm of novelty, although the repetition of every one of its extremely formal sections became wearisome.

The only novelty in the twelfth programme was Dr. Mackenzie's "Highland Ballad," most carefully and charmingly played by Lady Hallé, who was recalled, and responded willingly to the clearly spoken desire of the audience. Of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, of Weber's fairy-like "Oberon" Overture, and of Mozart's E flat Symphony nothing remains to be said. Mr. Oudin's French and Prussian songs agreeably alternated with the orchestral works. The cast for Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," which, with Sterndale Bennett's Overture bearing the same title, occupied the whole of the evening of the 25th, was certainly strong enough for a cantata so placid and void of dramatic strength. Miss Palliser, Mesdames Medora Henson and McKenzie, and Messrs. McKay and Black could have grappled with a far larger task.

Choral performances at the Gentlemen's Concerts have, of late years, been very rare. Perhaps it would have been better had more effort been made in time past to meet the taste of the English supporters of the Institution and to cultivate and utilise local resources. Be that as it may, the programme furnished by Dr. Watson's Vocal Society for the 15th ult. was instructive as well as pleasing. Three distinct stages were marked of what we may call our chamber choral music—the madrigals of the sixteenth century, the tuneful ditties of Sir Henry Bishop, and the healthier style to which a return has now been made, enhanced by a bolder and more dramatic element than the old writers affected.

The Saturday evening entertainments of Mr. Cross continue to prosper, and Mr. Barrett's have, after a short interval during the Christmas holidays, been successfully resumed.

Mr. Willy Hess's third Chamber Concert was not less pleasing than its predecessors, and the increase in the attendance was very encouraging. After Vieuxtemps's Fantasia-Appassionata (Op. 35) Mr. Hess was twice recalled. For the concluding night Mr. Leonard Borwick is engaged.

Mr. Lane's Choir gave "Elijah," on the 24th ult.; and the first of four performances by the Manchester Orchestra, under the direction of Signor Risegari, occupied the evening of the 27th ult.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society presented "The Messiah" at the Victoria Hall on the 14th ult., the soloists being Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rees, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. J. Leyland. The band was a worthy one, the trumpet solo being the only blot upon a creditable performance, and the well-balanced choir thoroughly familiar with the choruses. To Mr. James Garner, the founder and conductor, a word of praise is due for the energy he shows in training the members. The record of the Society is interesting. In 1882, first prize at Manchester Free Trade Hall; 1883, second at a local competition; 1884, Eisteddfod, second at Liverpool; while, in the following year, premier honours were won at the great Albert Hall competition.

Every choir experiences more or less the ebb and flow of the musical tide. The Burslem Tonic Sol-fa Choir has suffered many financial reverses recently, and this has checked its musical enterprise. The Town Hall is small, and the engagement of first-rate artists cannot be entertained. "The Messiah" was given at the Town Hall on the 21st ult., before a crowded audience. Unfortunately, the performance was uneven. The choir did its work most efficiently, but the soloists, with the exception of the bass (Mr. Lycett), were scarcely equal to the demands of the work. Mr. Sherratt conducted with characteristic zeal, and the small orchestra, aided by Mr. R. Parker at the organ, assisted in making the performance worthy of the traditions of the choir.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company visited Longton Theatre, and the enterprise has proved a financial success. Probably it will now be looked upon as an annual fixture. The répertoire of the Company included Mascagni's "Rustic Chivalry," "Pagliacci," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The production of the latter opera was a complete revelation to the music-lovers of the district, and the cordiality of its reception made ample amends for any slight Wagner received in England in years gone by.

All our local choral societies have resumed their rehearsals. Burslem will give a miscellaneous Concert, while Hanley is actively working with "Solomon." Stoke relies upon one performance of Dr. Heap's (the Conductor) "Fair Rosamund."

The fifth Meakin Concert took place on the 15th ult. Miss Evangeline Florence and Mr. Watkin Mills were the vocalists, and Mdlles. Marianne, Emmy and Fanny Eissler were responsible for selections for harp, pianoforte, and violin. The Concert was in every way very successful.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

After the December Concerts there is usually a lull in musical affairs here. The Sarum Choral Society is resting upon its laurels for the present, but rehearsals will soon be resumed in view of the principal Concert of the season, which always takes place at Easter. The new Salisbury Philharmonic Society, which has been so long talked of, will also make a start in a week or two, the County Hall having been already engaged for the first Concert, which will be given next month. Mr. Alfred Foley is the Conductor.

At Bournemouth Mr. Dan Godfrey, Jun.'s, excellent orchestra performs daily at the Winter Gardens, and gives Classical Concerts on Thursday afternoons, at each of which an entire Symphony is played. Amongst the Symphonies already included in the programmes have been Mozart's "Jupiter," Beethoven's C minor and C major, Schubert's "Unfinished," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" and "Italian." The band is twenty-five in number, and includes many players of well-known excellence.

The Test Valley Musical Society, under the conductorship of the Rev. E. H. Moberly, will give morning Concerts at the Guildhall, Winchester, and the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on the 1st and 2nd inst. Besides the orchestral pieces referred to a month or two since, the programmes will include some choice madrigals and part-songs, and Miss Margaret Barter is announced as solo vocalist.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

At Southsea the Christ Church Choral Society gave its first public Concert on the 11th ult. Mr. W. A. Griesbach was the Conductor, and the programme included Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and the usual miscellaneous selection. Miss Aitken sang the solo in the Psalm, and Mr. W. Young acted as pianist.

An important Concert was given by the Wilts Oratorio Society, at Devizes, on the 17th ult. The programme included Gounod's cantata "Gallia" and Hiller's "Song of Victory," both of which received an excellent rendering, the solos being finely sung by Master Edward Wood, a talented boy, who possesses a beautiful soprano voice. Besides the accompaniments to the choral works, the orchestra, an unusually good one, under the leadership of Mr. A. Foley, played Beethoven's Symphony (No. 1) in C, the War March from "Athalie," and Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde." The Concert was in every way a success, and much credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. Edwin Nunn, for the high state of excellence reached by this Society under his direction.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

"Music in Yorkshire" during the last weeks of the year is invariably associated with Handel, whose "Messiah" is performed in all the towns, and probably in many villages, of the West Riding with such unfailing regularity that Christmas would not seem Christmas in its absence. Out of the innumerable performances that took place this Christmastide, four may be selected for especial mention. The Bradford Old Choral Society, under Mr. Hartwell Robertshaw, gave an excellent all-round performance on December 20. The soloists were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Sarah Berry—whose highly sympathetic rendering of the air "He was despised" it would be difficult to over-praise—Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Thornton, the last a local bass singer of more than average power and ability. The chorus was fully worthy of West Riding traditions—powerful in tone and with an excellent attack. The most interesting feature of the performance was the band, which consisted to an unusual extent of young amateur players from the district, whose want of experience had been to a great degree neutralised by a long and careful series of rehearsals for the performance. The Halifax Society's "Messiah" performance, on December 21, suffered from the absence, through illness, of its regular Conductor, Mr. W. H. Garland, whose place was taken by an able amateur, Mr. T. Smith. The cast of soloists was the same as at the Bradford performance, with the exception of the tenor, Mr. Maldwyn Humphries, who sang with considerable refinement. The admirable rendering, by Mr. Tomlinson, of the trumpet obbligato to the air "The trumpet shall sound," on both occasions, deserves to be mentioned. As far as chorus-singing is concerned, the palm must certainly be awarded to the Huddersfield Choral Society, whose fine chorus is heard at its best in Handelian music. Anything grander than the weight of tone, precision of attack, and generally robust style in which the "Hallelujah" and "Amen" choruses, for example, are sung by this Society it would be difficult to imagine. The soloists at Huddersfield on December 22 were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, Messrs. Iver McKay and David Hughes. The band was passable. Mr. John Bowling conducted. Magnificent as was the chorus-singing at Huddersfield, the most interesting, and, on the whole, most finished performance of "The Messiah" was that of the Leeds Philharmonic Society, on December 20, which was made memorable by the employment for the first time in Yorkshire of Robert Franz's edition of the Handel-Mozart accompaniments. In other respects the performance, under Mr. Alfred Broughton's able direction, was of exceptional interest. Madame Albani's emphatic manner proved highly acceptable to the audience, Miss Berry's simple and unexaggerated singing affording an effective contrast, and Messrs. Hirwen Jones and Brereton completed the quartet. The chorus-singing was finished and brilliant, and the playing of the accompaniments unusually refined.

On the 9th ult. the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts were resumed, the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, under Mr. George Miller, supplying the chief part of the programme. One of Meyerbeer's "Fackeltänze," and Mr. German's charming suite of dances from his music to "King Henry the Eighth," were among the more interesting pieces in a popular programme. Miss Marjorie Eaton and Miss Marie Lummert were the vocalists, and deserve praise for their unconventional selection of songs. On the 12th ult. the fourth of the Bradford Subscription Concerts took place, the programme being of a lighter character than usual. Miss Evangeline Florence made her first appearance in the West Riding, and was very successful in Mr. Henschel's "Spring" song. Miss Dews, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Norman Salmond were the other vocalists. Miss Kleeberg's delicate and sympathetic touch was shown to advantage in a series of pianoforte pieces, including one of Brahms's recent compositions (Op. 117, No. 2). The violoncellist, Mr. Salmon, who had never before played in public in this country, showed himself to be not merely a master of the technique of his instrument, but a genuine artist in the highest sense of the word, the possessor of a sympathetic if not powerful tone, and free from exaggeration or affectation of any kind. On the 16th ult. Mr. Edgar Haddock gave one of his "Musical Evenings" at Leeds. Madame Fanny Moody, Madame Swiatlowsky, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Manners were the vocalists, a song from Glinka's "La vie pour le Czar," sung by the Russian prima donna with considerable dramatic power, being among the more interesting of the vocal pieces. Miss Pauline Sant-Angelo played some pianoforte solos both brilliantly and expressively, and the Concert-giver contributed a violin solo, besides playing the obbligato to Gounod's "Ave Maria."

At Middlesbrough the third of Mr. Corbett's Concerts was given on the 17th ult. Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Eleanor Rees, Messrs. E. Lloyd and C. Manners were the vocalists, Mr. Corbett the pianist, and Miss Maud Fletcher the violoncellist. The last-named artist's refined and artistic performances of solos by Piatti and Davidoff, and the spirited rendering of a movement from Mendelssohn's Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello, in which she was associated with Miss May Proudlock, were among the more striking features of a rather ordinary programme. On the 20th ult. the Bradford Permanent Orchestra gave one of its Concerts. Three movements from Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony were very creditably played, though the unexpected appearance of the big drum suggested that even Mendelssohn is thought to require "additional accompaniments." Miss Jeanie Rankin and Mr. Thomas Rutling were the vocalists, and Mr. W. B. Sewell conducted with care and ability.

The seventh of the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts was given on the 9th ult., in the Town Hall, before a large audience. Selections were given by the Marine Band (Portsmouth), under the bâton of Mr. Miller. The vocalists were Miss Marjorie Eaton and Miss Marie Lummert.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The sixth annual, and the ninth actual, performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given by the Philharmonic Society, at the Windsor Hall, on December 20. A local soloist, Miss Maude Burdette, acquitted herself with distinction in the contralto solos, and some competent amateurs, ladies and gentlemen, rendered considerable service in the orchestra, which was local (with the exception of Mr. E. N. Lafricain, of Boston, who played the trumpet obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound") and acquitted itself admirably. Miss Elizabeth Hamlin was satisfactory, and Mr. Ericsson F. Bushnell, though suffering from a slight cold, was evidently well liked by the audience, his fine voice appearing to great advantage in the recitatives and slow movements. Mr. Rieger, of New York (tenor), is a great favourite in Montreal, and deservedly so. Mr. Rieger will be heard in all the Society's Concerts this season.

A word for the chorus, which is rapidly gaining an enviable reputation on this continent for purity of tone and balance of parts. Constant practice is producing a steadiness and fulness of tone delightful to hear, the whole chorus of 250 voices responding to the beat of the Conductor, Mr. G. Couture, with precision and confidence. The singing of the "Hallelujah" and "Amen" were the most notable features of a very successful Concert.

The Mendelssohn Choir began its thirtieth season on Friday, December 29. The choir numbered ninety-two, and the parts were well balanced, the basses, perhaps, taking the palm for precision of attack and quality of tone. Two numbers were of particular interest—"Lay him low," composed by Mr. Horace W. Reyner, the accompanist of the Choir; and "Georgie Porgie," a humorous part-song, understood to be the composition of the Conductor. Both numbers are skilfully written. The soloists were Herr Anton Hegner, violoncellist, and Herr Emil Fischer, the celebrated bass of the German Opera of New York. Herr Hegner played an Elegie of Massenet's, a Romance of his own composition, a Tarantelle of Popper's, and Schubert's "L'Abeille." Herr Fischer sang Schubert's "Wanderer" and, in response to an encore, Lassen's "It was a dream" and Meyerbeer's "The Monk." A very fine Concert was slightly marred by the somewhat sombre nature of most of the selections by both soloists and choir.

It is a subject of great regret that the Mendelssohn Choir is to be disbanded at the end of the season, as Mr. Joseph Gould, the founder, and only Conductor the Choir has ever had, finds himself unable to continue it any longer. Such a choir is not the growth of a day, but of many years of arduous labour and continuous study, and the music-loving people of Montreal will long mourn its death.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Christmas always brings many performances of "The Messiah." This season has been no exception; and certain of these have been marked by more than ordinary excellence. First in importance, at least locally, was the superb interpretation of the New York Oratorio Society, under Mr. Walter Damrosch, at the Music Hall, on December 29 and 30; and repeated on the 3rd ult., in consequence of the general demand for seats, which the two regular Concerts did not fully meet. The solo work was assigned to Madame Nordica, Miss Carlotta Desvignes, Mr. J. H. McKinley, and Mr. David Bispham, all of whom gave great satisfaction, Madame Nordica especially. The chorus has never before attained such excellence—Mr. Damrosch's conducting being irreproachable.

At Ann Arbor (Mich.), under Professor A. A. Stanley, the Choral Union gave "The Messiah," with the assistance of Mr. Parker (from Boston), Mrs. Clements, Mr. Mills, and Miss Alice Bailey. This Union, which is a feature of the University School of Music, is doing admirable work in its study of the greater choral writings, as also in the frequent song and instrumental Recitals by distinguished artists from the East, and Dr. Stanley is to be congratulated for his propaganda of that which is highest and best in music.

In Washington, the Choral Society gave "The Messiah," under the direction of Mr. Kaspar, assisted by Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. E. C. Lowne, and Mr. Erickson F. Bushnell; the two latter are both well-known singers from New York, whose success in Washington added new laurels to their well-earned reputation as oratorio singers of high rank.

In Boston the Handel and Haydn Society gave the customary performance of "The Messiah." The forces engaged were the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Miss E. C. Hamlin, Miss Katherine Fisk, Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Keyn. and Mr. B. J. Lang (organist); the whole under Carl Zerrahn. The Handel and Haydn Society always gives an entirely satisfactory performance—except to the Boston critic, who is rarely pleased—and this year's "Messiah" was of more than ordinary excellence. Mr. Parker's "Hora Novissima" is in active rehearsal for the forthcoming production by this Society.

An interesting Concert was given on Tuesday evening, December 12, by the Manuscript Society, at which were produced original compositions by Chas. Crosat Converse, E. Marzo, C. Whilney Coombs, Ethelbert Nevin, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and others. The purpose of this Society is to foster American Art and give opportunity for the hearing, under favourable conditions, of original compositions. Of those produced at this Concert, a sketch for orchestra, "Bal Masqué," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and an Orchestra Suite by Max Muhlert were marked by the greatest originality of thought and fulness of knowledge; while the song "Rappelle Toi," of Ethelbert Nevin, was notable for its graceful theme, cleverly worked out in a novel treatment, in the way of accompaniment for strings, four horns, and harps. December 12 was also marked by the first Concert of the fifteenth season of the Banks Glee Club, under Mr. R. H. Humphries, assisted by Miss Jennie Dutton (soprano), Mr. W. H. Rieger (tenor), Miss Leonora von Stosch (violinist), and Mr. E. D. Jardine (organist). Noteworthy numbers were Hatton's "The happiest land," Abt's "Evening," and Dudley Buck's "Nun of Nidaros." The singing of this male chorus showed marked improvement over former seasons, and the solo numbers of Miss von Stosch and Mr. Rieger were characterised by their wonted skill and musicianly feeling. On the same evening Mr. Clement R. Gale gave his initial Musical Service at Calvary Church. It was an admirable performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment," and was attended by most of the leading choirmasters in the city, with whom the verdict was unanimous that Mr. Gale had given one of the most noteworthy of the many Musical Services which obtain so generally during this period of the Christian year. Dr. Woodcock, the successor of Mr. H. W. Parker at Holy Trinity, has continued the success achieved under Mr. Parker's direction, as was evinced by his very fine performance of "The Messiah," abridged for the purpose, on Sunday, December 31. Mr. A. S. Baker, at St. James's, had in rehearsal "The Messiah" for the 21st ult., so that every possible opportunity is afforded to the music-loving church-folk to hear this work under every condition.

The Church Choral Society, under Mr. R. H. Warren, has issued a circular history of the work accomplished thus far, from which may be gathered a knowledge of the important place which it holds among the musical forces of the Metropolis; and it is manifest that this is clearly appreciated, for even the stress of hard times has offered no obstacle to the continuance of these efforts; the financial support of the Society this year has been as generous and enthusiastic as heretofore.

In musical matters not ecclesiastical it is in order to note with pleasure that the difficulty between Mr. Damrosch and the Musical Protective Union, which threatened to disrupt the Symphony Orchestra, has been adjusted, and the work of our permanent orchestra has been resumed both in the regular Concerts and the Saturday and Sunday Evening Populars. At the Concert on Friday, the 5th ult., and Saturday, the 6th ult., were performed the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger"; Schumann's Symphony in D minor, No. 4; "Phaeton," Symphonic Poem by Saint-Saëns; and a novelty in the shape of a new Concerto for violin with orchestra, by Dr. Dvorák. The violin solo was beautifully played by Mr. Henri Marteau, who had mastered with mind and heart as well as fingers the great difficulties of the work. This young artist has attained, by his many gifts, artistic and personal, a prominent place in the regard of our musical public, no other violinist since Wieniawski's day having secured such a firm hold upon the goodwill of the people. Dr. Dvorák's new Symphony having been played by the Philharmonic, of New York, and the Symphony, of Boston, is now the subject of excited discussion as to whether or no it is distinctively American. Boston says "No!" New York says "Yes!" and when doctors dispute, who shall decide? Upon one point opinions are at one: that it is beautiful, original, and characterised by that wealth of invention, richness of colour, and lavish use of orchestration which have united to give Dr. Dvorák his pre-eminent place among living composers. Whether it is American seems of little moment in view of these things, but the question has given rise to animated discussion, in which, as usual, Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, has borne a worthy part, having enthusiasm, knowledge, and clear perception in his favour.

From last month's record was omitted the mention of a fine Concert by the Schubert Vocal Society, of Jersey City, under the direction of Mr. Victor Baier, who also holds the post of Assistant-Organist in Trinity Church, New York. Among other pleasing numbers were sung "The Goslings," by Dr. Bridge; "Great is Jehovah" ("Omnipotence"), by Schubert; Abt's "Morning Song," Mozart's "Lullaby," and J. S. Hatton's "The Lifeboat."

THE performance of the first two parts of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, given in St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, on Sunday afternoon, the 7th ult., and repeated on Friday evening, the 19th ult., was extremely good, and most creditable to those who organised it. The choir of the church was very slightly augmented for the occasion: the treble part was sung entirely by the boys belonging to the regular choir, twelve ladies' voices were added to the two male altos, and a few extra tenors and basses were present. A competent string orchestra and a capital drummer reinforced the organ, the wind parts being taken by Mr. Bird at the latter instrument. Mr. S. S. Higham conducted with much ability, and his excellent drilling of the choir, especially of the sopranos, contributed very materially to the general result. The soprano music, consisting of the recitative allotted to the Angel and the very difficult tenor air, transposed for the occasion, was undertaken by Mrs. Hutchinson, whose delivery of the rapid "divisions" in the air was extraordinarily fine. Miss Hilda Wilson sang "Slumber, Beloved," and the other contralto air with much artistic feeling, and the beautiful bass air and recitatives were admirably sung by Mr. Toy, a member of the choir. The tenor recitatives were taken by Herr Robert Hensler, whose efforts were to be excused on the ground that he undertook the part at short notice. Handel's fine Organ Concerto in G, played by Mr. Bird, made an effective closing voluntary.

THE annual meetings of the Tonic Sol-fa Association were held at the Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate Street, on the 20th ult. After business matters had been disposed of, Miss Isbills, of Upton, Essex, read a paper upon "The Musical Bridge between the School and the Choral Society." The paper dealt with the best means of interesting the young between the ages of fourteen and nineteen, and described the plan adopted in the classes trained by the reader at Upton Manor. To illustrate the paper a number of pieces were admirably performed by the juvenile choir and band trained by Miss Isbills. In the discussion which followed, several of the speakers eulogised the work accomplished by Miss Isbills, one remarking that if there were 5,000 such ladies in the country the question of the musical education of the young after they leave school would present no difficulties. In the evening Dr. C. J. Frost presided over a large gathering of members and their friends, when addresses were given by the chairman, Rev. J. T. Briscoe, and Mr. Henry Coward; and a miscellaneous programme of music, about equally divided between the audience, the Old Kent Road Choral Society, Miss Alice Warr, Miss Constance Warr, and Mr. T. Abel, was performed.

A CONCERT and Dramatic Recital as given at the West Hampstead Town Hall on the 16th ult., by Mr. Charles Fry, in aid of the Choir Fund of St. Gabriel's, Willesden Green. The choir of the church, under the direction of Mr. Henry Baker, sang several part-songs with admirable effect, Stevens's Glee, "The cloud-capt tow'rs," being given with remarkable precision. Songs were contributed by Miss Wilkinson, Mrs. Bramall, Mr. Aubrey, and Mr. Baker, the latter giving a most spirited rendering of "I'm a roamer." Mr. Clement Locknane accompanied. Mr. Fry's recitations were given with his usual dramatic power, a scene from "Othello" and "The Charity Dinner" being especially appreciated. Mr. Fry was assisted in a scene from the "School for Scandal" by his pupil, Miss Olive Kennett, who also stirred the audience to enthusiasm by a splendid delivery of Tennyson's "Revenge." The new elegantly decorated room, kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. Randall, was crowded to excess.

THE first Concert of the Clapton Philharmonic Society (a Union of the Choirs of Clapton Park and Lower Clapton Congregational and Downs Baptist Churches) was held in Clapton Park Congregational Church on the 17th ult. The choir numbered over 100, and the orchestra thirty-two. The soloists were Miss Ethel Winn, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Robert Grice; solo violin, Mr. Arthur Payne. Messrs. Arthur A. Hillam and Charles E. Smith shared the organ accompaniments, and Mr. David Davies conducted. The programme consisted of the first two parts of the "Creation," followed by the Overture "Son and Stranger" (Mendelssohn), violin solo, Andante from Concerto (Mendelssohn), and two anthems, Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father" and Barnby's "King all glorious." The performance was in all respects highly satisfactory, and it is hoped the Society may have a prosperous future.

IN spite of the unfitness of such dramatically-conceived operas as "Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria" for performance in a concert-room, a huge crowd was attracted to the Queen's Hall on the afternoon of the 20th ult., when the music of these works was given. An orchestra and chorus of 350, under Signor Armando Seppilli, an exceedingly capable Conductor, performed its share of the work with credit; and the list of soloists included such artists as Miss Ella Russell, Miss Damian, Miss Greta Williams; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Ben Davies, Arthur Oswald, and Eugène Oudin. Mr. Davies, who had to repeat Canio's famous song at the end of the first act of "Pagliacci"; Miss Russell, who was the heroine of both operas; Mr. Lloyd, the Turiddu; and Mr. Oudin, the Tonio and Alfio, were in excellent voice and vein, and altogether the Concert was so successful that it is to be repeated.

THE Hornsey and Crouch End Orchestral Society gave a Concert at the Corbin Memorial Hall, Crouch End, on the 16th ult. There was a complete orchestra of fifty performers, led by Mr. Arthur Payne, and conducted by Mr. Henry J. Baker. The programme included Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March and Concerto, No. 2, in D (the solo pianist being Miss Ellen Edridge, who played with much taste and expression). Much credit is due to the Conductor for the generally excellent performance of these pieces by the orchestra. Madame Marian McKenzie was the vocalist, and her singing of Gluck's "Che farò" and Sullivan's Willow Song was received with much enthusiasm.

THE first Concert of the Sydenham Orchestral Society was given, on the 18th ult., at Park Hall, Sydenham. The orchestral pieces consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Overture to "Raymond" (A. Thomas), Three Dances, "Henry VIII." (E. German), March from "Tannhäuser" (Wagner), and "Danse des Prêtresses" (Saint-Saëns), all of which were very creditably performed. The pianist was Miss Catherine Lamb, who played Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante with the orchestra, and in the second part gave Chopin's Nocturne in E flat and one of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Wörte. The vocalists were Miss Kathleen Grant and Mr. Braxton Smith. Mr. A. M. Hughes conducted.

THE West Ham Corporation have set a good example in ordering a first-class organ for the Town Hall, Stratford. This instrument, built by Forster and Andrews, of Hull, is an excellent specimen of the organ-builder's art. It is fitted throughout with pneumatic action and blown by a gas engine, and is in every way a first-class instrument. Dr. Bridge presided at the instrument on the night of the formal opening, the 15th ult. Speeches were made by the Mayor, Mr. Spencer Curwen, and Dr. Bridge. The East End of London possesses opportunities for Organ Recitals which are to be envied. We understand that the Corporation propose to order a similar organ for the Canning Town Hall.

THE Brookfield Choral Society gave its first Concert of the present season on December 29, at Highgate. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from "The Messiah," with a miscellaneous second part. The soloists were Miss Ellen Chambers, Miss Bessie Dore,

Mr. Maurice Aubrey, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. The chorus, under the able direction of Mr. William A. Gardner (Organist and Choirmaster of St. Anne's, Brookfield), gave promise of good work in the future. Mr. B. Patterson Parker delighted the audience with two violoncello solos during the evening.

THE choir of the Swiss Protestant Church, Shaftesbury Avenue, recently gave a fine performance of Schuyder von Wartensee's "Noël," a work as little known in London as the composer. He was born at Lucerne, of German parents, in 1786, and subsequently settled at Frankfort-on-Main, where he acquired considerable fame as a teacher, among his pupils being Pearsall and John Barnett. He died in 1868. "Noël" is full of melody, and, as rendered at the Swiss Church, appears to be a charming work. Mr. R. A. Northcott, the Organist, conducted with his wonted discretion and good taste.

THE following is a list of those who passed in the examinations in music (second division) at the University of London, 1893: Intermediate—Thomas Keen, John Latham, Elisabeth Annie Norris, Percy Rodney Rideout, Walter Slater. B. Mus.—Arthur Makinson Fox, Henry William Jones, Richard Francis Lloyd, William Henry Vivian Pearce. Intermediate D. Mus.—John Matthew Ennis. Examiners: Professor J. F. Bridge, Dr. C. H. Parry, Professor J. H. Poynting, Professor J. J. Thomson.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave its usual monthly Concert at Pimlico Rooms on the 5th ult. The vocalists were Misses Annie Matthews, Blanche and Ernestine Handcock, and Annie Wilson; Messrs. Arthur Weston, Kirkley, Campbell, and James Budd. Miss Dora Robinson played some pianoforte solos. The choir sang several part-songs. Mr. S. H. Lamb accompanied, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" will be performed at the next Concert, on the 2nd inst.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union's second Smoking Concert of the current season was given at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 11th ult. The choral pieces were in all cases interpreted in highly commendable style, a well-deserved encore being accorded to Mr. J. H. Maunder's new chorus, "Song of the Northmen." The Meister Glee Singers met with an enthusiastic reception, and songs were contributed by Messrs. Watson and D'Oyly. Mr. Maunder conducted with his usual ability.

ON Saturday, the 13th ult., a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given at the Goldsmiths' Institute. Most of the choruses were very well sung, but suffered from the unavoidable distance between the two divisions. The principal vocalists were Miss Stella Maris, Miss Elsie Holme, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Charles Ackerman. Mr. C. J. Smith presided at the organ, and Dr. Churchill Sibley was Conductor.

THE Saturday Evening Organ Recitals at St. Barnabas', Kentish Town, have been continued during the past month. The Recitals have been given by Mr. G. T. Pinches, with the exception of that on the 20th ult., when Mr. F. S. Marsh, Organist of St. Luke's, Hackney, was the recitalist. A special feature of interest on this occasion was the performance of Schumann's Concerto in A minor, in which the pianoforte part was played by Mr. Herbert Gresham.

THE programme for the Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, which is to take place at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, June 9, will include the chorus "Be not afraid," from "Elijah," and anthems "Lighten our Darkness" (G. Rayleigh Vicars), "Break forth into joy" (Barnby), "Sing unto the Lord" (Sydenham), "Hearken unto me" (Sullivan), "I will extol Thee" (Hudson), and some part-songs.

AT the recent Royal College of Organists' Examination, the following students gained the Diploma of Fellowship: J. H. L. Gauntlett, T. Hassard, W. Heaton, E. Jagger, H. A. Jeboult, W. E. Pitman, P. R. Scrivener, A. P. Stephenson, J. E. Tidnam. Thirty-four candidates were successful at the examination for Associateship of the Royal College of Organists, held on the 16th, 17th, and 18th ult.

ON Sunday evening, the 14th ult., the choir of Stepney Meeting House, assisted by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. R. D. Metcalfe, gave an excellent performance of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The solos were taken by Miss Kate Nicholls and Messrs. Jones and Raine. The spirited rendering of the chorus "Awake, thou that sleepest," is deserving of special mention.

AN Organ Recital was given by Mr. W. Stevenson Hoyte, on the 18th ult., at the Parish Church, Hornsey. The Recital, which included pieces by Handel, Guilmant, Stainer, Silas, Wagner, Spohr, Bach, and Widor, was preceded by a shortened form of Evening Prayer. Mr. Hoyte's brilliant performance was listened to with deep interest and attention by a large congregation.

THE usual monthly Organ Recital took place at St. Anne's, Bermondsey, on the 7th ult. The organist was Mr. Stretton Swann; vocalist, Mr. Henry George; violinist, Mr. Harry Foreman. The programme included Overture in D (Smart), Minuet à la Mozart (J. Shaw), and Andante from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Some carols were also sung by the choir.

MISS ETHEL SHARPE, the gifted and sympathetic young English pianist who, it will be remembered, was a pupil of Mr. Franklin Taylor at the Royal College of Music, gave a Recital in Vienna the other day with quite extraordinary success. The critics, with Dr. Hanslick at their head, were generous in praise, especially of the emotional qualities of Miss Sharpe's playing.

THE following solo vocalists have been engaged for the Triennial Handel Festival in June next: Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Emma Juch, Madame Clara Samuell, Madame Melba, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Clara Butt; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Santley, Mr. Norman Salmond, and Mr. Andrew Black.

IT is pleasant to note the inclusion, in recent programmes of the music played at "The Queen's Dinner," of several examples of native art, among which may be named Sullivan's "Tempest" Overture, an Orchestral Ballade by Mr. Stewart Macpherson, and the three charming Dances from "Henry VIII.," by Edward German.

THE Competition for the Sainton-Dolby Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music took place on the 10th ult. The examiners were Madame Lemmens Sherrington and Messrs. Ettore Fiori, J. T. Hutchinson, Fred. Walker, and William H. Cummings (Chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Minnie Florence Temple Cullis.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah," on the 10th ult., at All Hallows' Church, Bromley. The soloists were Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Madame Lily Howard, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Henry Baker. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

AN Organ Recital was given at the Church of St. Mary, Brookfield, by Mr. J. M. Ennis, on the 15th ult., and included pieces by Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Bach, Guilmant, and Schubert. The vocalist was Miss Kate Savile Hughes, and solo violinist Miss Janie Hutchinson.

MISS A. D. EASTWOOD has, during the past month, successfully passed the Examination held by the Incorporated Society of Musicians in the advanced grade of pianoforte playing, and has also taken honours in the senior division, Trinity College, London.

THE Arion Male-Voice Glee Club, not long ago founded in Victoria, B.C., has, we learn, already made itself quite a reputation there. Its Conductor is Mr. W. Greig, a native of Glasgow. The Club gives three Concerts per annum.

THE first lady to receive the diploma of Associate of the Royal College of Organists since the Charter has been granted was Miss E. Brooker, pupil of Mr. Henry Clark, Principal of the London Organ School.

MR. ARTHUR O'LEARY has accepted the post of Director of Studies and the Chairmanship of the Committee of Management of the Beckenham School of Music.

MR. WILLEBY has withdrawn his action for libel against THE MUSICAL TIMES.

REVIEWS.

Catalogue Descriptif et Analytique du Musée Instrumental du Conservatoire Royal de Musique de Bruxelles. Par Victor Charles Mahillon. Tome I., Deuxième Edition. [Gand: Ad. Hoste.]

This volume is a catalogue only in form—as regards contents it gives the most complete account we have yet seen of the musical instruments of all epochs and nations, accompanied by historical notes of great value, and copiously illustrated by sketches, executed, if not with great finish, yet with accuracy sufficient for all practical purposes. The splendid collection of instruments at the Brussels Conservatoire numbers at the present moment, we believe, over 2,000 examples. Of these 576 are dealt with in the volume under notice. They emanate from all parts of the world, four continents and fifty-eight different countries having been placed under requisition, and include a number of Indian instruments presented by the Rajah, Sir Surindo Mohun Tagore, whose efforts in the cause of musical education in India are so well known. The catalogue proper is preceded by an essay of eighty-nine pages on the system of classification adopted; and here it is that our indebtedness to the gifted curator is most apparent. It was pointed out, only about four years ago, by Professor Niecks, that no really satisfactory classification of musical instruments was in existence. We venture to think that the need has been supplied by M. Mahillon. He divides all instruments—firstly, into four classes according to the nature of the bodies which actually produce the sound. Thus, the first class, in which the sound is due to the natural elasticity of the bodies themselves, he calls autophonic instruments (Instruments autophones); those the sound of which is due to the vibration of membranes made elastic by tension, and which he calls membranic, form the second class; wind instruments form the third; and stringed instruments the fourth. Each of these classes is divided into branches, distinguished by the mode by which the sonorous body is made to vibrate; and each branch into sections, distinguished by the structure of the sonorous body, by the form of the apparatus producing the vibration, or by the nature of this last. Each section includes a number of individual instruments, differing only in certain details of form or method of handling. When these are sufficiently marked the section is divided into sub-sections. Instruments within the sections, constructed on the same type, but differing in size or pitch of key, are described as a family. The actual result of this classification on the instruments here dealt with is: 4 classes, 11 branches, 36 sections, and 18 sub-sections. The volume, which is inexpensive, and very little larger than a Murray guide book, should be in every musician's library.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Second series. Nos. 670—684. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these is very interesting as being a genuine composition of Henry VIII. It is a madrigal in three parts, entitled "The time of youth," and is noteworthy for the liberal use of unprepared discords. Whether these are due to imperfect knowledge or the monarch's independence of contrapuntal rules cannot be determined. This and the following five numbers have been scored by "H. B. B." for the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society. They are "Come o'er the burn, Bessie" (anonymous, circa 1500); "Enforce yourself as God's own Knight," by Edmund Turges; "Titus musing," by William Newark; "Ah, my dear Son," an anonymous Christmas carol, edited, with ad lib. organ accompaniment, by Dr. Charles W. Pearce; and "Pastime with good company," by Henry VIII. All these date from about the beginning of the sixteenth century. The originals are unbarred, but bars have been supplied for convenience, though of course the accents should be placed on the words and not strictly on the first note of the bars. In Nos. 676 to 683 a reversion is made to modern music. Here we have a series of piquant part-songs by Rheinberger (Op. 170). The vocal music of this German composer is not so well known in this country as it deserves to be, and conductors of singing classes should glance through this series of pieces, which it may be said would prove most effective if sung without accompaniment, though a pianoforte part is provided is case of need. The English translations of the words are from the experienced pen of the Rev. J. Troutbeck. The last for the present is "The Oak Tree," by George J. Bennett. This was written for the Quincentenary Festival at Winchester College last year, and is a genial and musicianly composition with some contrapuntal interest, though it is well within the means of ordinarily well-trained choirs.

Organ Arrangements. By John Hiles. Books 1—9. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is admitted by all but the most pedantic section of musicians that organ transcriptions have a legitimate place by the side of original compositions, taking into consideration the infinite resources of the "king of instruments." The choruses of Handel and other oratorio composers, together with symphonic movements from the works of the great masters, have ever formed a prominent place in the repertory of the best performers on the organ, and words of welcome may therefore be accorded to this new series of transcriptions. The composers drawn upon include Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bach, Spohr, Gluck, and Schumann, and some of the movements have been previously transcribed with success. Others, however, are less familiar as organ pieces, among these being the favourite Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8); the Andante più tosto allegretto from Beethoven's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata (Op. 12, No. 2); the Largo con espressione from the same composer's Trio in G (Op. 1, No. 2); the Adagio from Spohr's "Notturno" (Op. 34); and the slow movement from Mendelssohn's posthumous Sextet (Op. 111). The arrangements are at once musicianly and judicious—that is to say, in other words, they are intelligently written for the instrument, neither piling up unnecessary difficulties nor omitting to remember that the organ is not an orchestra. These transcriptions may be commended without reservation.

Concert-Overture. Composed for the Philharmonic Society in the year 1815, by Luigi Cherubini (a hitherto unpublished work). Score and parts edited by Friederich Grützmacher. Arranged for pianoforte duet (four hands) by C. A. Barry. [Leipzig: C. F. Kahnt.]

This is the delightful work that was revived (after a sleep of forty years) in February, 1892, at the Crystal Palace, and played a few weeks later at a Philharmonic Concert—the third of the eightieth season. It was then so fully noticed in these columns that we need now only call attention to its recent publication as a pianoforte duet, in which form its tunefulness, grace, and masterly finish and brilliance are likely to make themselves hosts of admirers wherever fingers sufficiently nimble and neat to do them justice, are forthcoming. Mr. Barry has performed his delicate task with much care and tact, having secured a maximum of effect without unduly taxing the players' executive resources. The Overture is admirably printed, but fuller indications of the scoring should be given in future editions.

The Orpheus. New series. Nos. 255—263. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

There seems to be a general opinion in musical circles, professional and amateur, that male-voice choirs are no longer in favour in this country; but the rapid issue of new numbers of the time-honoured "Orpheus" goes far to confute any such belief. The numbers indicated above represent only a small section of those recently published, the remainder being held over for future notice. The first is entitled "Echoes," by J. Baptiste Calkin, a cheerful part-song entirely devoid of pretentiousness. "It was a lover," by Charles Wood, is a little more elaborate in part-writing, and may be regarded as a musicianly and effective setting of Shakespeare's verses. The remaining numbers only need formal reference in order to commend them to notice. No. 257 is the Earl of Mornington's glee, "When for the world's repose," and the remaining numbers are by Spohr, their titles being "Upwards," "Restless love," "Know ye the land?" "Spring's Oracle," "Hark, brothers, hark," and "Good Night," these being versions—with English words from the practised pen of the Rev. J. Troutbeck—of the Cassel composer's set of Six Part-Songs (Op. 44), which may, perhaps, through this edition, obtain some measure of the recognition they richly deserve.

The Parish Choir Book. Nos. 140, 141, and 142. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

New settings of the Evening Canticles for ordinary use are apparently in great request. A version by G. B. J. Aitken is somewhat free and discursive, the counterpoint being by no means exclusively of the first order, or "note against note." Mr. Aitken is an able composer, and his service, which is by no means so difficult as it may appear at the first glance, is deserving of more than ordinary commendation. No. 141 is yet another setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, the composer, in this instance, being Arthur Henry Brown. This is simpler, and although the voice parts are in four-part harmony, they are printed in what is known as short score. The music does not present any special characteristics worthy of mention, but it is generally dignified and church-like. No. 142 contains the "Benedictus qui venit" and the "Agnus Dei" set in F, by Arthur Page. The composer has a pleasant vein of melody, and he writes easily and agreeably within the limits he has in the present instance imposed upon himself.

Florette; or, The Goose Girl. An Operetta in Three Acts, for Treble Voices. Written by A. M. Allen. Composed by Agnes Bartlett. [Joseph Williams.]

The book of this pretty little work has been founded on Grimm's well-known fairy tale, and supplies plenty of scenes admirably suited to delight young hearts and minds. There are twelve "numbers," which include a processional march and chorus, a Spinning Song, a capital chorus of "Brownies," a fairy dance and chorus, and an "Incantation" scene. Miss Bartlett's music, while always easy and tuneful, gives plenty of scope to the performers; it abounds in characteristic touches of a dramatic kind, and throughout reveals the hand of a cultivated musician. Greater fulness in the matter of "stage directions" would, we think, add still more to "Florette's" already numerous attractions.

Young Lochinvar. A Ballad for chorus and orchestra. Poetry by Sir Walter Scott; music by Archibald Davidson Arnott. Op. 6. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Every admirer of Sir Walter Scott knows his stirring poem "Young Lochinvar," and it is not now used for musical purposes for the first time. As a serious work of art, however, Mr. Arnott's setting is of more significance than the once popular song. An appropriate Scotch character marks the bold melody which opens the work and on which it may be said to be chiefly founded, but throughout the music is full of dash and energy and calculated to interest choristers who like plenty of "go" in the strains they have to sing. "Young Lochinvar" should meet with much acceptance among choral societes in town and country, and it presents no difficulties that cannot be readily surmounted.

St. Paul's Cathedral.—The annual Dedication Festival took place on the 25th ult. (the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul). After Matins, the music of the Communion Service was Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" ("St. Cecilia"). The rendering was admirable: choir, orchestra, and organ alike meriting the highest praise. Members of the congregation pronounced the service to be one of the most beautiful and devotional ever heard in the Cathedral. At the afternoon Service the musical portion consisted of Eaton Faning's fine setting of the Canticles in C major, and the usual selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in the place of the anthem. This is the twenty-first year of this Orchestral Service in St. Paul's Cathedral, and the large congregation proved that it is gaining appreciation every time it is heard. The orchestra and chorus were skilfully conducted by Dr. Martin, and Mr. Hodge showed his usual ability as soloist and accompanist on the organ.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Aix-la-Chapelle.—At the third municipal subscription Concert, on December 14, Berlioz's colossal Requiem was splendidly performed, under the direction of Herr Schwickerath. —— Edgar Tinel's oratorio "Franciscus" has been selected for performance at the next Lower Rhenish Musical Festival, to be held here on Whitsunday and the two following days.

Alexandria (Egypt).—A Conservatoire of Music is to be founded here, and the sum of 4,000 francs has been considered sufficient capital to start the enterprise with. Of this amount the "professor" of singing, harmony, counterpoint, and musical history receives 1,200 francs; the "professor" of the violin and viola 1,200 francs; the cello and bass teachers will be made happy with 500 francs each, and the housekeeper (nothing is said about the house he is to "keep"!) 200 francs. The director will be chosen from among the first two gentlemen, and the fortunate man will be granted an extra sum of 300 francs. The odd 100 francs will do beautifully as a reserve fund!

Antwerp.—"Tantalus," the second part of a tetralogy called "Hippodamia," by the Bohemian composer Zdenko Fibich, was lately produced with great success.

Baden.—To celebrate the eightieth birthday of the composer, Jacques Rosenhain, a grand Concert was given lately, the programme of which consisted entirely of works by this excellent musician. It included a Symphony, a Pianoforte Concerto, two Overtures, a Triumphal March, a fragment from an oratorio, and a number of songs. The Concert was a great success, and a veritable triumph for the modest author of all these works.

Berlin.—On the 22nd ult. Mr. Emile Sauret, assisted by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Professor F. Mannstädt, gave a Concert at the Singakademie. The famous violinist played Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Pibroch," M. Moszkowski's Concerto (Op. 30), conducted by the composer, and Saint-Saëns's Introduction et Rondo Capriccioso.

Bonn.—The Society "Beethoven Haus" contemplates giving a cycle of Beethoven's Nine Symphonies in May next. The orchestra will be the excellent Cologne Town Band, under Professor Franz Wüllner.

Bremen.—On December 25 Paul Geisler's opera "Palm" was successfully produced.

Breslau.—Anton Rubinstein has arranged with the Director of the Breslau Town Theatre that his sacred opera "Christus" is to be produced at this theatre, at a Matinée, during the present winter. The composer will conduct the rehearsals. The score of the work has just been published. ——On December 20 Verdi's "Falstaff" was given for the first time. The performance was, on the whole, excellent, and the work was much applauded.

Bucharest.—Wagner's "Lohengrin" was lately given in this town for the first time. The performance was exceedingly good, the mounting most admirable, and the success emphatic.

Carlsruhe.—On the 5th ult. Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was given at the Court Theatre, for the first time, under Felix Mottl.

Cassel.—A new one-acter, "Spielmannsglück," by Reinhold Hermann, was successfully produced on the 1st ult.

Cologne.—Professor Carl Reinecke, of Leipzig, conducted, on December 11, at the Town Theatre, a performance of his orchestral work "From the Cradle to the Grave," with appropriate tableaux vivants on the stage. The success of the unusual novelty was very considerable. On the 1st ult. Smetana's "Sold Bride" was given for the first time and very warmly received.

Dresden.—Rubinstein's opera "Der Kinder der Haide" was, on December 12, given for the first time at the Court Theatre, the composer conducting. It is, of course, no new work, as it was produced at Vienna as far back as 1860.——A new Symphony in D minor, by the rising Danish composer Christian Sinding, was produced at the fifth Concert of the Royal Orchestra, on the 4th ult., and achieved a great success.

Geneva.—Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was given here for the first time on the 3rd ult., and enthusiastically received. The performance was excellent and the mounting superb.

Ghent.—According to the Cologne Gazette, M. Adolphe Samuel, the director of the Conservatoire of Music, has just completed a Grand Symphony, with choruses, entitled "The Christ." M. Samuel, who is in his seventieth year, is the author of five other symphonies, several operas, cantatas, &c.

Hamburg.—On the 3rd ult. Verdi's "Falstaff" was given for the first time at the Town Theatre, and enthusiastically received, especially as regards the second act.

Leipzig.—Dr. Max Abraham, the head of the famous music publishing firm, C. F. Peters, has presented a splendid library to this town. Its nucleus is the library of the well-known Dr. Alfred Dörffel, which Dr. Abraham acquired some years since, and has since then enriched to a very considerable extent. It is especially well provided with full scores of operas. The library is at No. 26, Königstrasse, and open to the public between the hours of 9—1 and 3—6. Dr. Emil Vogel is librarian and author of the catalogue.

Lyons.—Wagner's "Walküre," which was performed here for the first time on the 2nd ult., was brilliantly successful.

Milan.—Wagner's "Walküre" opened the season at La Scala on December 27, but was a failure. The performance is said to have been wretchedly poor, especially as regards the orchestra. Miss Macintyre was the Sieglinde, and her rendering of the part is warmly praised.

Munich.—E. Humperdinck's musical fairy play "Hänsel und Gretel" was given here, for the first time, under Hermann Levi, on December 30, and met with a similarly favourable reception to that accorded to it at Weimar. It is said that since Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" and Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" (no doubt the revival of this work is referred to) no high class "light" opera by a German composer has been hailed with such delight. ——The dates for the next Wagner Cycle at the Court Theatre are already fixed. Twenty-five performances will be given between August 8 and October 3 prox. "Tristan" will be performed on the five Wednesdays, "Die Meistersinger" on the four Fridays, "Rheingold" on the four Saturdays, "Die Walküre" on the four Sundays, "Siegfried" on the four Tuesdays, and "Götterdämmerung" on the four Thursdays.

Nantes. — A Concert performance of Wagner's "Walküre" was given on December 24 by a number of amateurs, all ardent admirers of "the master." Although the accompaniments were played by only a double quartet of strings and two pianofortes, the work is said to have created an "enormous sensation." A new prose translation by M. Ernst, which scrupulously reproduces the rhythm of the original verse, was used on this occasion for the first time.

Paris.—It is rumoured that it is the intention of MM. Bertrand and Gailhard, the directors of the Grand Opéra, to add each year a work of Wagner's to their répertoire, so that a complete cycle of the Bayreuth master's works can be given in 1900, the year decided upon for the next Great Exposition.——The library of the Conservatoire has acquired the original MS. score of Félicien David's "Le Désert." It has also been presented with some fifty scores of works by Russian composers, a gift from the Moscow publisher, M. P. Jurgenson.——M. Antoine Mercié has been selected as the sculptor of the Gounod monument. ——On the 6th ult. a terrible fire occurred at the warehouse in which the scenery of the Grand Opéra is stored. The scenery of about thirty operas was burnt, amongst them being some of the most popular works in the répertoire, as well as that of the second act of Massenet's new opera, "Thaïs," which was on the point of being produced.—— At one of the recent Concerts d'Harcourt, which was devoted to music of the seventeenth century, fragments of Henry Purcell's "King Arthur" were performed. Purcell in Paris! It seems incredible.—— Monsieur E. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" was, on December 27, performed for the first time at the Grand Opéra, and achieved a decided success. The work has had to wait nearly seven years after its first performance at Bruxelles before any French opera manager ventured to mount it. In the meanwhile it was heard at Carlsruhe (in 1889) and Munich (in 1890), while the first performance in France took place at Lyons in April last.

Prague.—The orchestra of the Bohemian opera struck in a body on December 31 for an increase of salary. The performance of Smetana's "Sold Bride," announced for the evening, had to be postponed sine die, which must have been especially annoying to a number of artists from the Munich Court Theatre, who had come specially from the Bavarian capital to study Smetana's work. The demands of the members of the orchestra cannot be called exorbitant, considering that they ask for a minimum salary of only 40 florins per month! From later accounts we learn that the strike is at an end.

Rome.—The organ by Messrs. P. Conacher and Co., Huddersfield, which has been munificently presented by the Rev. Wilfrid Stanton, of Lancashire, to the English Church at Rome, was dedicated at the Epiphany Services, when Sir Herbert Oakeley presided, and also gave a Recital, on the 9th ult., of music by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c.——Signor Filippo Capocci, the organist of the Lateran, tried the organ in the English Church last week, and, besides some of his own compositions, played Bach's E flat Organ Fugue (known as "St. Anne's" in England) and Mendelssohn's B flat Sonata.——The Queen of Italy seems to be a true patroness of good music. Her Majesty attends all the weekly Concerts of the "Societá Orchestrale Romana," at which Beethoven's nine Symphonies are given this winter in consecutive order. No. 9, at the ninth Concert, is looked forward to with curiosity, and especially as regards an Italian translation of Schiller and its suitability to Beethoven's music. Queen Margherita is understood also to show her appreciation of classical music by hearing every week a Sonata of Beethoven, played by the eminent pianist Signor Sgambati.——Last week Sir Herbert Oakeley was to play to the Directors and Professors of the Reale Academia di S. Cecilia, for which illustrious Society a large organ for its concert hall is being built in Germany, to be inaugurated at the Palestrina commemoration.

St. Petersburg. — By order of the Emperor, a memorial plate has already been affixed to the house in which Tschaikowsky died only a few months ago.

The Hague.—M. Saint-Saëns's "Phryné" was given here recently for the first time, but coldly received.

Vienna.—A new Symphony in E flat, by the Bohemian, Zdenko Fibich, was produced at the fourth Philharmonic Concert and pleased very much.

Weimar.—Herren Richard Strauss and Hugo Becker gave a Concert recently, the programme of which consisted of the whole of Beethoven's five Sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello. Such a bill of fare has, at least, the charm of unconventionality to recommend it.——E. Humperdinck's musical fairy play "Hänsel und Gretel," after one of Grimm's tales, was, on December 23, produced here with great success.

The eighty-second season of the Philharmonic Society will comprise seven Concerts, commencing on the 28th inst. and terminating on June 21. The Concerts will be given at the Queen's Hall, under the conductorship of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. The following works are announced to be performed for the first time at these Concerts: New Symphony in E minor, by Dvorák; Symphony, No. 2, in A minor, by Edward German; New Symphony, No. 6, by Tschaikowsky (first time in England); Overture to "King Lear," Berlioz; "Overture D'Ariosto," by Vincenzo Ferroni (first time in England); Overture to "Sakuntala," by Goldmark; Overture "On an unwritten Tragedy" in A, by Dr. Hubert Parry (first time in London); "Lustspiel" Overture, by Smetana; "Eine Faust Ouverture," Wagner; "Pibroch," by Dr. Mackenzie; "Zigeunerweisen" Fantasia, by Sophie Menter (first time in England); Polish Fantasia, by Paderewski; Fantasia, by Tschaikowsky (first time in England). The répertoire of the season will also include Beethoven's Symphonies, No. 4, in B flat, and No. 8, in F; Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, in D; Saint-Saëns's Symphony in C; Overture, "Meeresstille," Mendelssohn; Beethoven's Pianoforte Concertos in E flat and G. Dvorák and Saint-Saëns will conduct their own works. The artists already engaged are Mr. Leonard Borwick, Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Sophie Menter, Mr. Sapellnikoff, and Mr. Paderewski; Mdlle. Frida Scotta, Mr. Sauret, and Mr. César Thomson; Miss Ella Russell, Mdlle. Landi, Madame Amy Sherwin, Madame Clementina de Vere Sapio, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Oudin.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ART OF CHANTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The difficult and much-debated subject of the Art of Chanting the English Psalter has received recent notice in your review of Mr. Heywood's book, a review which has called forth from him an explanatory rejoinder. The Musical News of December 30 also contains a highly sympathetic and laudatory article by Mr. J. Percy Baker on Mr. Heywood's principles and practice. May I be allowed space for a few remarks?

It is impossible not to admire Mr. Heywood's learning, research, and ingenuity. He has done good service in exhibiting the successive stages through which the ancient chant has passed, in the process of evolution into its modern harmonised derivative, the Anglican Single Chant, especially in view of the common but mistaken belief that there is little or no connection between the two ends of the series.

But when he sets out to show that the treatment of the modern chant should be governed by ancient practice he enters upon doubtful ground, which has confessedly given way under his own feet. The copious outpouring of the vials of his wrath and disdain upon musicians of the "Cathedral" school leads his readers to suspect him of an uneasy consciousness that the development of the modern chant out of the ancient has not been after all an arbitrary and deliberate departure from a time-honoured type, brought about by impatient and ignorant contempt for the past, but a natural growth felt to be demanded by altered conditions.

As between the ancient and the modern chant, the governing condition is that the one is applied to Latin, with its quantities, the other to English, with its accents. English cannot be treated as if it were Latin without doing violence to its well-defined characteristics. The problem with which we are confronted to-day is how best to adapt to a rhythmic mould our English version of the Psalms. I say a rhythmic mould, for "free rhythm," so-called, is rhythm after all, with its laws and requirements, and any amount of assertion cannot hide that fact, or master the key of the position. It may be a wonderful and horrible thing that there should be a strong accent on the final note of a chant, but on Mr. Heywood's own showing it is necessarily so in no fewer than 1,132 verses out of the 2,508 of the Psalter, a tolerably liberal use of the privilege of departing from the sacro-sanct type. Exceptions are said to prove the rule; sometimes they go far to supersede it.

Do what one will, that obtrusive final accent cannot be got rid of, as has been already pointed out in your review. Accepting the dictum that the modern chant, accurately conceived of and noted, is in approximate quadruple time, the plaintiff's case fails out of his own brief; for a musical phrase in 4-2 time, ending with two semibreves, or two minims and a semibreve (see Mr. Heywood's examples), carries an accent—a secondary one, it might be, but still an accent—on the final semibreve, and in 1,132 cases this accent, we are told, must have special weight given to it It is no answer to quote a metrical line, such as "O day of rest and gladness," for it is not regular metre with which one has to deal, and the musical treatment of it lies outside the present question.

If I were asked to give the reason for the widespread acceptance of the Psalters of the "Cathedral" type, which to Mr. Heywood and Mr. Baker appear so objectionable, I should say, without hesitation, that it mainly consists in their taking into account the natural accents of English, not at all in the indifference of the people, or their heedless running after a new thing. Imagine the 1,376 verses said to have unaccented final syllables, set to chants in approximate quadruple time on the "Church" principle, involving as it must the assignment to the last two (or three) notes of the cadence of such words as "enemies," "equity," "wickedness," "thundered," "cymbals," "pieces," "marriage," "trouble"! I pass by such monstrosities as "testimo-nies," "adversar-ies," "persecu-tors," from which the mere sense of humour might surely save a man. Is it surprising that the English people, who know and love their mother-tongue, do not take kindly to such dealing with her? Talk of fetters! Compared with fetters such as these, what are the fetters of "strict rhythm," to quote the disparaging phrase! By the practised musician they are "worn lightly," indeed as irksome bonds are unfelt. "Adelaida" is in "strict rhythm" enough, but that inevitable condition has never prevented a great tenor from giving full and moving expression to the song. At the same time, the most exquisite and nicely balanced rhythm can become a dead and loathsome thing in the hands of one to whom it is only formal inelastic ding-dong.

The same professed impatience of "strict rhythm" shows itself in the denunciation of the use of any means of indicating the impending close of the recitation.

This is another of the expedients which has been devised to meet a necessity and obviate a difficulty. Mr. Heywood himself records the former want of mutual understanding and uniform practice in choirs with respect to the recitation. Hence has come the employment of what may be called a premonitory notice, to ensure, as far as may be, that the recitation shall be joined on smoothly and uniformly to the melodic parts of the chant. Mr. Heywood justly regards the chant "not as melody preceded by a few words of hurried recitation, but rather as rhetorical recitation terminating in melody." Precisely so; but why need the recitation be hurried? This hurry is still one of the prevailing faults in chanting. Asterisks, and the insertion of the mark which is condemned as "a grave error on the part of those who are responsible for its introduction," to quote Mr. Baker, are devices to correct this fault, and get over the difficulty mentioned above. It should never be forgotten, however, that the efficacy of all written signs and devices depends on the intelligent appreciation of the spirit and meaning which lies behind them.

It must be allowed that it is quite possible—for it has been done—to fall into such exaggerated respect for the claims of accent as to produce in too lavish abundance those "chattering finals" to which Mr. Heywood, not without reason, takes exception; and it must also be admitted that some dissyllables and trisyllables at the ends of verses lend themselves much more easily and inoffensively than others to the treatment for which Mr. Heywood contends. But to carry out his principle mechanically without variation or relief cannot but lead, in the greater number of instances, to results which will never commend themselves to general approval and adoption, whatever be the energy, perseverance, and adroitness with which they are recommended. Mr. Baker, I notice, expects from the "upholders of the 'Cathedral' use" the very practical rejoinder: "Strict time makes chanting so much easier, especially for imperfectly-trained choirs." Well; ease in chanting is not altogether a bad thing; but I for one agree with Mr. Baker when he says, farther on, that the best way, not the easiest way, is the end to seek and strive for. Perhaps some of us perverse "upholders of the 'Cathedral' use" think that our system of pointing is at once both the easiest and the best. If we do, we find that the vast majority of our countrymen agree with us. Now and then, under an able and determined leader, there are sporadic outbreaks of antiquarianism. Praisers of past times are always with us, and societies for the preservation of ancient monuments, who are said, if they are not misrepresented, to prefer ruins to restorations. In the matter before us may we not do the like? Let us preserve with reverence the remains of ancient types; but we shall not improve our chants and chanting by vain regrets over the supersession of the imperfect methods of earlier days, or by endeavouring to check and turn back the advance of musical art in any of its manifold continuous developments; but by going forward wisely and circumspectly, not rashly and inconsiderately breaking with the past, but not surrendering to hide-bound ecclesiasticism.

He would be a real benefactor, worthy of a niche in the Temple of Fame, who would invent a new type of chant which would do away with as many as possible of the limitations which attach to the Anglican chant, without re-imposing fetters from which we have knowingly shaken ourselves free. Pointing adapted to such a type of chant would speedily follow, natural in its treatment of Coverdale's marvellous version, yet not ignoring true musical rhythm. This, however, is a dream, an ideal of the future, perhaps never to be realised. Meanwhile, a decided advance in interest, diffusion, and skill is observable. Well-nigh half-a-century ago Dr. Stephen Elvey prophesied that in a few years we should have better chants and better chanting. Unquestionably his prophecy has been fulfilled.—I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

A Cathedralist.

"JEBB'S CHORAL RESPONSES AND LITANIES."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to enquire through your columns if any of your readers can give me information respecting the second volume of "Jebb's Choral Responses and Litanies of the United Church of England and Ireland"?

I have the first volume, published by George Bell, Fleet Street (now George Bell and Son, York Street, Covent Garden), in 1847, and I have evidence that a second volume was published in 1857; but Messrs. Bell and Son inform me that they did not publish it, nor did they ever hear of a second volume. Enquiries of other publishers have proved fruitless. If any of the readers of The Musical Times can inform me by whom this second volume was published, and where a copy can be obtained, he will confer a favour on—Yours faithfully,

Geo. J. Tredaway.

WAGNER'S "COLUMBUS" OVERTURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Mr. de Ternant's letter in your last issue must have been read with the greatest interest by all music-lovers, for it goes tantalisingly near to the discovery of another of Richard Wagner's works. I am afraid, however, that, even should the "fair young lady with spectacles" make a sign of life and yield up her treasure, it would be impossible, rightfully, to "introduce the work to any concert-room" without making arrangements with Richard Wagner's heirs.

Mr. de Ternant's fleeting discovery most certainly suggests the idea that Adolphe Jullien was wrong when he connected the "Columbus" Overture with, practically speaking, a dead-letter office. Curiously enough, we have had two legends of this kind, the one cited by Jullien and the other by Ferdinand Praeger, but dealing with Sir George Smart and the "Rule, Britannia" Overture. Is it not possible that the two stories are really variations of one original fact; or are we to reject both? This is another of those minor mysteries which enshroud the fate of Wagner's earlier works. For, much as Wagner has been decried as an egoist, it is remarkable how little importance he attached to the hoarding of his own relics. If we go right back to his youth we find that his little poem on the death of a schoolfellow, his first proud incarnation in printer's ink and paper, slid away into the bottomless abyss of things forgotten; his Symphony shared the same fate for half-a-century; of his "Autobiographic Sketch" (1842) he "did not possess a copy, or know where to get one," in 1851; in 1860 he had not a single example of the poem of the "Ring des Nibelungen," privately printed in 1853; and in 1864, or 1865, he was without a specimen of his 1852 "Instructions for the performance of 'Tannhäuser.'"

Another point that strikes one in Mr. de Ternant's valuable contribution, is the wondrous difference between the price at which a manuscript is offered to a stranger and that demanded from its author. Only a year after your correspondent was asked fourpence for a score by Richard Wagner, the composer himself was endeavouring to recover the only existing musical fragment of his destroyed and discarded opera "Die Hochzeit." It consisted of thirty-six folio pages, which would certainly be considerably less than the score and parts of the "Columbus" Overture; but mark the disparity in estimates of value! The musicseller who had, somehow or other, come into possession of this curio, demanded no less a sum than 5,000 marks (£250)—in other words, fifteen thousand times the price required by the poor old Paris bookstall-keeper. Wagner declined to submit to such extortion, and brought an action to recover possession of his property; the result of which was that he had to pay thirty pounds in costs, and go without his manuscript! These facts I borrow from an advance copy of a portion of Herr C. F. Glasenapp's forthcoming new and much enlarged edition of his "Life of Richard Wagner." From the same source I may add another to the contemporary criticisms of the "Columbus" Overture. After its performance at Riga (circa 1838), H. Dorn reported: "One cannot call the conception and working-out of this Overture anything other than truly Beethovenian. Grand and beautiful thoughts, daring rhythmic figures, the melody less prominent, the working-out broad and purposely arranged in massive phrases; on the other hand, the externals modern in the extreme, well-nigh Bellinian, as will be seen at once when I merely mention the naked fact that in the 'Columbus' two valve-trumpets are employed, and their united parts fill fourteen and a half closely written pages."

I may conclude by informing your readers that the "Bayreuther Taschen-Kalender" for 1894 gives particulars of Wagner's Opus 5. This consists of "seven compositions for Goethe's 'Faust,'" written at Leipzig, 1832. These compositions rest among the "Wahnfried" archives, and there is no present intention of publishing them.

Yours truly,

Wm. Ashton Ellis.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Almondsbury. — The newly-formed Choral Society, established last autumn, and which now consists of forty members, gave evidence of its satisfactory progress by a Concert on the 3rd ult., when a good selection of glees and part-songs was sung, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Watson. The programme also included vocal solos by Miss F. Gregory, Miss Lower, Miss May, and Mr. F. Olive; violin pieces by Mr. F. Watts, and performances on the mandoline and zither by Mr. Otto Schondwaldt.

Biggleswade.—The first Musical Service in the Parish Church was given on the 3rd ult., when a selection from "The Messiah" was rendered by a band and chorus of about eighty executants. The soloists were Master Gough, Mr. Warwick, and Mr. Kingston. Mr. J. G. Cooper presided at the organ, and Mr. Cooper, sen., conducted. The large congregation on this occasion justifies the hope that similar services will be often given.

Birkenhead.—The Recitals upon the Hope-Jones electric organ in St. John's Church, on the first three Saturdays of last month, were respectively given by Dr. Haydn Keeton, Mr. R. V. S. Stanley, and Mr. A. Mitchell. The programmes included pieces by all the best known writers and were of an interesting character. The vocalist at the first two Recitals was Mr. Robert Hope-Jones, and at the third, Mr. Alfred Foxworthy.

Blaina.—Mr. E. Prout's cantata "The Red Cross Knight" was performed in costume and from memory on December 25, 26, and 27, in the Public Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. S. J. Brynmawr. The soloists were Miss J. Lewis, Miss A. L. Dowlais, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, Mr. C. Siebert, and Mr. J. B. Mellis, the choruses being sung by the Excelsior United Choir. The performances were repeated on December 28 at the New Town Hall, Abertillery, and on the following night at the Victoria Hall, Abercarn.

Bournemouth.— Mr. William Lee opened, on the 10th ult., the new organ erected by Messrs. Monk in St. John the Evangelist's. Mr. Lee played an effective selection, which was agreeably varied by vocal solos contributed by Miss E. A. Oakley and Mr. T. Bason.

Chigwell.—A special Service was held in the Parish Church on December 31, when the Christmas music from Handel's "Messiah" was impressively rendered by an augmented choir numbering over sixty voices. Master W. A. Gough, Messrs. Herbert Clinch and H. F. Chamen were the soloists. Mr. H. Norton accompanied, and Mr. Henry Riding conducted.

Cleckheaton.—Sir Joseph Barnby's Oratorio "Rebekah" was performed, on the 2nd ult., by the Philharmonic Society, under the personal direction of the composer, who subsequently expressed himself greatly pleased by the manner in which the work was rendered. The soloists were Madame Conway, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Robert Grice, who also assisted in the miscellaneous second part of the programme, which was conducted by Mr. W. H. Wright.

Dudley.—The third of a series of six Sunday Afternoon Musical Services was given on the 21st ult., when Mr. W. Stansfield was the organist; Mr. M. Leidy, the violinist, and Mr. Pardoe the vocalist.

Eastbourne.—Mr. George Langley, an excellent resident pianist, has made an interesting experiment. On the 9th and 16th ult. he gave Recitals, assisted on the violin by Herr Cramer and the Rev. C. J. Langley, at 11.30 in the forenoon. The attendance encouraged a belief that the experiment was successful. Mr. Langley believes that audiences are more fit to hear the great masters before, than after, lunch.

Halifax, Nova Scotia.—During December, Mr. F. Gateward, Organist and Director of the Cathedral Choir, gave two Organ Recitals at St. George's Church; and on the 3rd ult. lectured on "The voice and singing," at the Church of England Institute.

Harrogate.—The annual New Year's gathering in connection with the Methodist Free Church was held on the 1st ult., when a selection from "The Messiah" was effectively sung by the choir, which was augmented for the occasion. The soloists were Mrs. F. W. Shaw, the Misses Parker, Thompson, and Barraclough, and Messrs. Land and Brown. Mr. T. J. Paley presided at the organ, and the Conductor was Mr. J. Allanson Benson.

Hawarden.—Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The May Queen" was successfully performed on the 15th ult., by the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. G. Iggulden. The solos were admirably sung by Miss Louise Cestria, Mrs. Leigh Hancock, and Messrs. Thornborough and Ditchburn, of the Cathedral Choir, Chester.

Hong Kong.—Spohr's "Last Judgment" was successfully performed before a crowded congregation in the Cathedral on November 9 last. The work was accompanied by a full orchestra, which included the band of the Shropshire Light Infantry, and the fine Cathedral organ. Mr. Conrad Schwencke conducted, and Mr. C. F. A. Sangster, the Cathedral Organist, presided at the organ.

Horsforth.— Mr. F. Whatmoor gave a historical Pianoforte Recital on the 10th ult., when he played an admirable selection of pieces by ancient and modern composers from Bach to Liszt.

Hull.—Mr. H. W. Richards gave an Organ Recital, on the 13th ult., in the Assembly Rooms. Miss Jennie Langford and Mr. J. R. Henson were the vocalists.

Ipswich.—Mr. A. R. Gaul's cantata "Una," written for the recent Norwich Festival, was produced, under the conductorship of the composer, by Mr. Frederic W. Dalby's Choral Society, on the 16th ult., at the Public Hall. The soloists were Miss Rose Long, Miss Ceinwen Jones, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Daniel Price. The choruses were effectively sung, and the accompaniments played by an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. H. W. Panrücker, with Mrs. Dalby at the pianoforte. The work seems to have greatly pleased the audience, since repetitions were demanded from all the soloists, the chorus "Let's hasten on" being also encored.

Kingston-on-Thames.—The fourth of the series of Organ Recitals now being given on Thursdays at All Saints' Church was distinguished by an unhackneyed programme, the music being by Schumann, Wagner, Liszt, Salomé, and Saint-Saëns. Mr. A. Percy Alderson was the recitalist.

Leytonstone.—The new organ in the Parish Church, recently built by Messrs. Brindley and Forster, was dedicated on the 4th ult., when a Recital was given by Mr. E. C. Nunn. On the 11th ult. another Recital was given by Mr. Henry Riding, with a programme drawn from the works of Morandi, Lemare, Handel, Jackson, Rheinberger, Riding, Mailly, W. G. Wood, and Wareing. Two vocal solos were tastefully sung by Mr. H. F. Chamen.—— "Prince Kamar-al-Zaman," an operetta by Mr. Cuthbert Nunn, was produced here on the 17th ult. Mr. Nunn has already written several cantatas and operettas, but this one was an exceptional success.

Lowestoft.—Miss Penly gave a successful Ballad Concert in the Public Hall, on the 19th ult., when she was ably assisted by Miss Chatten, Miss Serruys, Miss Skeen, and Messrs. Charles Chilley, Skeen, Tuddenham, Burton, and R. J Pitcher.

Melbourne, Australia.—An impressive performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given on December 14, in St. Paul's Cathedral, by the choir, which was augmented for the occasion. The soloists were Master M'Causland, Mr. J. Wood, and Mr. G. Wright. There was no orchestra, but the overture, as arranged by Mr. W. T. Best, and the Symphony at the beginning of the second part, as laid out for the organ by Sir John Stainer, were most effectively played by Mr. Ernest Wood, who also gave a fine rendering of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor as an out-going voluntary.——Mr. Ernest Wood, from October 18 to November 22 last, gave a series of weekly Organ Recitals in St. Paul's Cathedral. The programmes were admirably chosen, and presented specimens of the finest works of all schools which have been written for the "king of instruments." The local press speak in the highest terms of Mr. Wood's performances, which can scarcely have failed to exert a beneficial influence.

Newark.—The first Subscription Concert of the Instrumental Society, formed last year by Mr. W. H. Norledge, was given on the 2nd ult., in the Town Hall. The programme included the Overture to Weber's "Oberon" and Mr. Edward German's dances from his music to "Henry VIII." Mr. Alexander Tucker was the vocalist, and made a most favourable impression on a large audience. Owing to the illness of Mr. Norledge, the bâton was entrusted to Mr. R. W. Liddle, whose conducting fully justified the confidence reposed in him.

Newcastle.—The Chamber Music Society, which for thirteen years past has been doing such good work, gave its fifty-seventh Concert on the 9th ult., when the programme included Brahms's Sextet in G (Op. 36), Dvorák's Terzetto in C (Op. 74), and Spohr's Double Quartet in E minor (Op. 87). The instrumentalists were Messrs. Bent, Sutcliffe, Stephenson, Hopkinson, Hobday, Kearne, Ludwig, Blagrove, and Preston. Several songs were contributed by Mr. Magrath.

Newmains, Lanarkshire.—A Kinderspiel, especially written for the occasion, was successfully produced, with effective stage accessories, on the 2nd ult., by the children of the Coltness Ironworks' School, under the direction of Mr. Robert Booth. The work, entitled "Sisters Three; or, Britannia's Heroes," may be recommended to those in search of operettas for young people. The libretto, by Mr. A. M. Wright, is bright and interesting; and the music, by Mr. R. Booth and Mr. J. K. Cross, simple and effective. Upwards of 170 children took part in the production, which reflected the greatest credit on all concerned.

Northampton.—The Choral Society's rendering of "The Messiah," on the 4th ult., was as excellent as that of "Elijah" in November last. A fully capable vocal quartet was provided in Miss Honeybone, Miss Frances Turner, Mr. Francis Lloyd, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and the choristers have seldom sung more effectively. Mr. A. W. Warren led an admirable orchestra, Mr. R. W. Strickland was the Organist, and Mr. Brook Sampson conducted.

Northwood, Isle of Wight.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Frederick Rutland, presented its numerous patrons, on the 11th ult., with Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Mozart's Twelfth Mass, which were admirably rendered. The vocal quartet consisted of Miss Amy Sergeant, Mrs. Thorpe, Mr. A. Pennington, and Mr. B. Groves, and the accompaniments were played by an efficient orchestra.

Norwich.—With the commendable purposes of reviving interest in an unjustly neglected work and increasing the fund now being raised to provide a new organ for the Cathedral, the Orchestral Union gave, on the 18th ult., in St. Andrew's Hall, a very creditable performance of Handel's Oratorio "Jephtha," which, it is said, has not been heard in this city since the Festival of 1827. The chorus almost entirely consisted of members of the Cathedral choir. Miss Ellen Chambers made a favourable impression by the facility with which she sang the florid passages in the part of Iphis, and the other soloists displayed artistic earnestness; they were Miss Marion Tilney, Mrs. R. V. Reyner, Mr. S. Hemmings, and Mr. J. B. Smith. Mr. C. H. Duffield presided at the organ, and Mr. Ernest Harcourt conducted.

Perth.—The Perth Musical Society gave a performance of "The Messiah" at its first Concert for this season, on December 29. The members are by this time familiar with the choruses, and a satisfactory rendering was therefore secured. The four soloists were Misses Maggie Davies and Jeanie Rankin, Messrs. James Langland and David Hughes, all of whom sang in Perth for the first time. Miss Rankin and Mr. Hughes did excellent work in the alto and bass parts respectively. The accompaniments were creditably played. Mr. F. S. Graves conducted, as usual.

Slough.—Mr. Walter T. Blanchett, Organist of St. Mary's, was presented, on the 17th ult., with an illuminated address and a purse containing £42, by the Rector and Assistant-Clergy and choirs and congregations of St. Mary's and St. Lawrence's Churches, who "wished to testify their appreciation of the ability, tact, and thoroughness with which Mr. Blanchett has fulfilled his duties as Organist for over a quarter of a century."

Swansea.—The Misses Florence and Minnie Fricker, to whom this town is much indebted for musical enjoyment, gave a most successful miscellaneous Concert on the 18th ult., in the Albert Hall. The Concert-givers, whose tasteful pianoforte and harp playing was fully appreciated, were ably assisted by Madame Alice Gomez, Miss Winifred Ludlam, Mr. William Evans, and Mr. David Hughes.

Taunton.—Miss Alice M. Smith, a promising young harpist, gave an interesting Concert, on the 11th ult., at the Assembly Rooms. In solos, and duets with Miss Catherine Lytton, Miss Smith displayed admirable command of her instrument, and the programme was pleasantly varied by songs contributed by Miss Lytton and Mr. Fletcher.

Tenby.—Effective performances were given, on December 28, by the Choral Society conducted by Mrs. Cattley, of Mendelssohn's setting of the 95th Psalm and Professor Bridge's "Inchcape Rock." The programme also included Berthold Tours's glee "The New Year's Song" and several vocal solos. The principal soloists were Mrs. Parcell, Miss Ethel Spark, Miss Roberts, Miss Williams, and Mr. F. Whishaw.

Tredegar.—The eighth performance of the Choral Union was given, in the Temperance Hall, on New Year's Day, when Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was excellently rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. Illtyd J. David. Miss Gertrude Hughes, Miss Catherine Morgan, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. D. Hughes sang the solos with their customary ability, Mr. Dan Pearce presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. T. Roberts's Cardiff Orchestra rendered efficient aid in the accompaniments.

Vancouver, North America.—Six of Mr. F. Victor Austin's pupils—viz., Mrs. Buntzen, Mrs. Painton, Miss F. Vaughan, Miss E. de Wolf, Mr. F. W. Rounsefell, and Mr. J. Errington—gave an interesting Chamber Concert on December 28 in the Philharmonic Hall. Valuable assistance was contributed by Miss Vaughan and Miss E. de W. Vaughan.

Wembley.—The annual free performance of "The Messiah" was given in Wembley Church on December 30, at 3 p.m., to a crowded congregation. The solos were sung by Mrs. MacCarthy, Miss Mary Clarke, Mr. Stirling Wells, and Mr. Martin Morris, and Madame Emily Lawrence conducted.——A very effective performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was given on the 19th ult., by the Choral Society, under the Conductorship of Madame Emily Lawrence. The solos were well sung by Mrs. Mary Owen, Miss Mary Clarke, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Charles Loder; Mr. Swallow assisting in the quartets. In the miscellaneous second part Mr. H. Mole gave an effective rendering of Mrs. Lawrence's "Sarchedon's Love Song," and Miss May Wade and Master Harold King exhibited promising skill in a violin duet. The accompaniments were played by Mrs. Avila and Mr. Erskine Allon.

Workington.—The annual Eisteddfod, originally promoted by Mr. W. Griffiths, was held on New Year's Day, and excited the usual interest. The chief events were the choral competitions, in the first of which the Seaton Male-voice Choir, conducted by Mr. T. Dixon, were the victors. For anthem singing the first prize was won by the choir of the Wesleyan Church, conducted by Mr. Macaulay.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Frank S. Marsh, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Luke's, Hackney.—Mr. William A. Montgomery, Organist and Choirmaster to Parish Church, Strangford, Co. Down.—Mr. Arthur Reynolds to St. Andrew's Free Church, Edinburgh.—Mr. Frederick Jennings, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George's, Darlington.—Mr. W. Sutcliffe, Organist and Choirmaster to Wesley Chapel, Lancaster.—Mr. J. H. Bridger to the Parish Church, Farnborough, Hants.—Mr. W. E. Stevenson to St. Paul's, Lisson Grove.—Mr. Fred. Felix Blackbee, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Andrew's, Boscombe.—Mr. Edward Nicol, Organist and Choirmaster to the North U.P. Church, Perth.—Mr. Archibald Hollier, Assistant-Organist and Music Master to Harrow School.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Dan Jones (Principal Solo Tenor) to Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin.—Mr. Fred. Habbijam (Bass) to St. Anne's, Soho.—Mr. James Victor Bentley (Alto) to St. German's, Blackheath.

MUSICAL GESTURES

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC

BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE

MUS. DOC., OXON.

Organist and Master of the Choristers of Westminster Abbey; Gresham Professor of Music.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This little work is designed to present, by means of a series of short lessons, in which manual exercises are the leading feature, an attractive and expeditious method of learning the simpler rudiments of music.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS. In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

No little amusement was created last evening by the spectacle of a number of Dr. Bridge's choristers crossing the platform with measured tread while enunciating the notes of the scale in any key desired. All the "Gestures" were duly illustrated in this way, and their simplicity was thus effectually brought home to the minds of the audience. . . . Dr. Bridge's "Gestures" will facilitate the learning of the "rudiments" by young pupils.

STANDARD.

Dr. Bridge afterwards proceeded to put near a score of choristers from Westminster Abbey through musical gestures—twenty-three in all—and with their assistance he abundantly demonstrated his simple but effective method.

DAILY NEWS.

Professor Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, has just written for Novello's "Music Primers" an interesting account of how the Abbey choirboys are taught in class by means of "Musical Gestures." The shapes of notes and the rests are shown by various positions of the fingers and arms, the tones and semitones by steps and half steps, and so forth, there being twenty-three "Gestures," each illustrated by the picture of an Abbey boy in the act of performing it. At Westminster Abbey the juniors have long practised the rudiments by means of this ingenious device, and Professor Bridge enthusiastically declares the boys prefer the music game to cricket. He is now publishing the book mainly for use in the nursery, for school classes, and for country choirs.

MORNING POST.

With the aid of the Westminster Choristers, who were in attendance, Dr. Bridge ran through the whole set of lessons, and the proficiency of the boys and the ingenious and amusing gestures and rhymes employed occasioned hearty applause and laughter. The whole time occupied by the lecture and the practical exposition of the method was only just over an hour.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Judging from the illustrations, vocal and physical, shown by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, the invention should be of immense service to country choirmasters.

MORNING LEADER.

. . . Bids fair to win immortality in the grateful recollection of future generations of children. He has invented a new system of imparting the rudiments of music to children, a system which, in his own words, "combines physical training with musical training." . . . By Dr. Bridge's system—one of the very greatest ingenuity—you enlist a child's love of exercise and movement in aid of his musical studies.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Like most good inventions, its simplicity is its chief merit. It will save the instructors and pupils alike many a weary half-hour.

ECHO.

The ingenious manual devices by which these highly-trained lads represented the duration of notes and their position and the various written signs of music, beat time double, triple, and quadruple, sang and stepped the scales, and explained the meaning of the gestures, in their natural voices, and not in stupid monotone, were as novel as they were pleasing, and were evidently as much enjoyed by the boys as the spectators.

SUNDAY TIMES.

An expeditious method of learning the simpler rudiments of music by means of manual exercises. . . . Should be of much service in training country choirs.

FIGARO.

It is a very ingenious idea, and admirably suited for the nursery and also for training village church choirs and others.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The organist of Westminster Abbey has often something new to tell us, and as he is well provided with a set of chubby cherubs on whom experiments can be tried, we are not surprised at his putting forth a new means of teaching youngsters the signs in music. . . . At the end of the book are ten Vocal Exercises in rhyme, designed to impress upon beginners the rudiments of music. These are most cleverly constructed, and we advise choirmasters to get the book and make use of them.

THE INFANT'S MISTRESS.

This little manual is devised for the easier teaching of the rudiments of music (Staff), and we can assure our readers that nothing simpler in the way of learning the value of the notes can be desired. . . . That the doctrines put forth are sound, Dr. Bridge's name is a guarantee of, and the printing and general get-up of the book make me wonder that it can be put forth at such a moderate price.

BOARD TEACHER.

A successful attempt to ground young children in the Rudiments of Music by the aid of a species of Musical Drill. It should be in use in all schools where the Staff notation is taught.

WESTERN DAILY MERCURY.

As a Primer pure and simple, it must be given a very high place in a list of some remarkable books. Dr. Bridge's endeavour has been to prepare a practical guide to the study of the rudiments of music, and he has succeeded in making it eminently practical. . . . Dr. Bridge has made a liberal use of manual exercises, and I anticipate a very large sale for the book.

BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

The directions and illustrations in the book are very clear, and by means of them it is evident that lads can quickly be taught the rudiments of music intended to be conveyed.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Dr. Bridge's system may be described as a sort of musical drill, in which the scholars' gestures are ingeniously contrived to represent the various symbols used to express notes, clefs, rests, &c. In addition to this, some vocal exercises, entitled "Rudiments in Rhyme," are well calculated to "impress upon beginners the rudiments of music, while exercising at the same time their voices."

LEEDS MERCURY.

A portion of the Abbey Soprano Choir illustrated vocally the novel but simple scheme of Professor Bridge, and the proceedings, held in the City of London School, were followed with considerable interest by a crowded audience.

GLASGOW HERALD.

A most ingenious little book. . . . The book is largely made up of beautifully drawn diagrams and figures, which make the work of the teacher plain. . . . A better method than that here laid down of driving the elements into boys' heads could scarcely be imagined.

THE PROPER REPAIR OF HARPS.

Messrs. Erard regret to find it necessary to caution the public against entrusting their harps to the hands of unskilful workmen representing themselves to have been at some time associated with their firm. In most cases people thus representing themselves have been at some time Tuners of Pianofortes only in Messrs. Erard's establishment, and have No Practical Knowledge whatever of Messrs. Erard's Harp factory.

In some cases representations are made that the materials employed in the manufacture of harps by Messrs. Erard have been purchased by other people. Messrs. Erard beg to say that neither now nor at any previous time have they supplied any of the materials employed in the manufacture and repair of the harps at present used. The material so referred to by unskilful repairers is invariably the discarded stock belonging only to obsolete instruments.

The only really skilful harp workmen are those to be found in Messrs. Erard's factories in London and Paris.

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

PASSION SERVICE

NEW SACRED WORK

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

For Solo, Recitative (Male Voices), and Chorus, with Hymns introduced to be sung by the Congregation, the words specially written for this work by

MILDRED GAUNTLETT

THE MUSIC BY

WILLIAM S. VINNING, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"This composition is the work of a competent musician, and from beginning to end is full of reverent, tuneful, and appropriate music. We do not see how it could be better done. This Cantata ought to prove very acceptable for Lenten use in our churches."—Church Times.

"The 'Song of the Passion' is a simplified version of the sacred musical epic of which Bach's great Passion Music is the crown and glory."—Guardian.

"This Cantata will prove very useful, and well calculated for performance in a church or chapel; both music and words are of a devotional type."—Daily News.

"The various incidents of the Passion are pourtrayed in musical rhythm, majestic, solemn, or dramatic, as becomes the ever-changing scenes. The several sayings of the Saviour are prominent for beauty of treatment, and written for a tenor voice. The choruses are short, but vividly dramatic."—Bath Journal.

"Those in search of a new work for oratorio purposes during Lent should see Mr. W. S. Vinning's 'Song of the Passion.' The composer has given us an extremely melodious and sympathetic setting of the solemn subject, and one that is well within the reach of ordinary Church choirs. The scene 'In the Judgment Hall,' down to the cry 'Crucify Him,' is finely conceived and full of impetus."—Bayswater Chronicle.

"Though more suitable for Church use during Lent, this Cantata might be performed with good effect by an ordinary Choral Society. The work is well laid out, very melodious, and by no means difficult. No doubt it will be extensively used during the coming season, and will be found most useful where the immortal settings of the 'Passion' by Bach are too difficult."—Musical News.

"Mr. Shinn has the happy knack of writing popular music, which is at the same time thoroughly good and free from serious difficulties. This, his latest work, will find acceptance amongst Choral Societies and Church Choirs. The Choruses are bold and effective. The Solo writing is melodious and well suited to the words. The quartet 'Blessed are the dead' is really charming."—Nonconformist Musical Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but withal melodious, musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

DESCRIPTIVE CHORAL SONG.

"In this setting of Sir Walter Scott's well-known translation of Goethe's "Erl-King" ballad, our townsman, Mr. Gaul, has succeeded in the production of a graphic illustration of a difficult subject. UNA

CANTATA

FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

VERSE BY

FREDERICK ENOCH

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PERFORMANCE IN THE PUBLIC HALL, IPSWICH, JANUARY 16, 1894.

"'Una' has been so recently described and criticised that there is no necessity for detailed reference to the composition. Roughly speaking, it is founded upon the story of 'Una and the Lion' as told in the 'Faërie Queene,' amplified in verse of unusual excellence by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and full of romantic incident which commends itself to picturesque musical expression. . . . possesses in a marked degree the great charms of tunefulness and vivacity. It is above all things an understandable Cantata—not one of those crabbed and crooked things which no ordinary person can understand. The most striking and romantic number is undoubtedly the chorus 'Hark! the Angelus is calling,' in which the campanels used at Norwich (manufactured by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) were introduced. It is free and comparatively simple in style, but full of poetic melody, recalling by a flash of association that famous and familiar picture of 'The Angelus.' This was admirably given, and the choruses throughout, indeed, 'went' with great spirit and precision, reflecting much credit upon those engaged, and upon Mr. Dalby's efforts as leader in preparing for the Concert. The swinging chorus, 'Let's hasten on,' was loudly encored. A similar compliment was paid to all four soloists for their best efforts—to Mr. Henry Piercy for the song, 'Shine, vestal star'; to Miss Croft for the taking solo, 'The enchanter's wand,' which should become a popular excerpt; to Miss Rose Long, who did full and sympathetic justice to the charming song, 'O love will love,' and to Mr. Daniel Price for his rendering of 'A Palmer, met upon my way.' At the close, the performance as a whole was loudly applauded by the well-pleased audience. The composer himself conducted, and was most heartily welcomed as he came to the front of the platform."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and sauve part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction."—South-Western World.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD (Psalm 23).
A Choral Setting, without Solos.
By N. KILBURN, Mus. B.
Price One Shilling.

"This work has already been favourably reviewed in these columns, and we are pleased to say that its performance more than justified the good opinion derived from a perusal of the score. It is a charming work, well written and effective, and should be taken up by choral societies in search of interesting novelties."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Written in modern style and enriched with skilful orchestration, this composition met with a full measure of success, and the composer was loudly recalled at the close. The chorus parts are scholarly and effective, and masterly examples of fugal writing are given. Altogether it is a work which resolutely speaks for itself, is capable of standing alone, and therefore must live."—Durham Chronicle.

"The first part finished with Mr. Kilburn's setting of the 23rd Psalm. This was the first complete performance of the work, and the audience were delighted with it."—Sunderland Echo.

"Mr. Kilburn's 23rd Psalm is a welcome addition to works available for Church Festival use; as there is a tendency at the present day to restore oratorio to its original home, choirmasters will find this work particularly suited to their needs."—Northern Echo.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S WORKS.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS
A SACRED CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

"Mr. Gaul's latest work is another proof of his practical wisdom as well as of his ability as a composer. We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra, with Mr. A. J. Eyre as organist. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work, 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"The part-writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout. There is sufficient variety to prevent any feeling of monotony. . . . At its close the composer was heartily cheered."—Daily News.

"Without being unduly difficult, it is indisputably effective."—London Figaro.

"At the close of the work, portions of which were loudly applauded, Mr. Gaul, who conducted, was warmly complimented on a Cantata which is likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City' and other of his compositions."—Daily Chronicle.

"Characterised by the same refinement as that of Mr. Gaul's extremely successful work 'The Holy City.'"—The Athenæum.

"We may say at once that the music is characterised by Mr. Gaul's usual felicity of treatment. Mr. Gaul had every reason to be gratified with the performance and reception of his Cantata, and he may expect to hear of many more performances."—Musical Times.

"Musicianly and excellent, and not too difficult to imperil its popularity."—Musical Opinion.

"One of the most musicianly, melodious, and well conceived works of its popular composer."—School Music Review.

Price 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

THE TEN VIRGINS
A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which every one can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would have their works popular with choral societies, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long-continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced now-a-days is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—'The Messiah,' 'Creation,' and 'Elijah'—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—'The Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'—and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal, Dec. 17, 1890.

Bow and Bromley Institute Choir.—"The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. If the verdict of a miscellaneous audience, that could have no possible reason for being favourably prejudiced, is of any account in estimating the merit of a new work, a career that will rival that of the same composer's 'Holy City' may be predicted for 'The Ten Virgins.' That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—Musical Times, Dec. 1, 1890.

VOICE-TRAINING STUDIES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

By EMIL BEHNKE and DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"This work contains 24 Progressive Studies in different styles, and is intended as a companion or supplementary volume to 'Voice-Training Exercises.' Those of a more cantabile character are to be used as Solfeggi, the others are to be sung as Vocalises. In this Second Edition the accompaniments have been simplified. Highly favourable opinions of these Studies have been expressed by Sir John Stainer, Sir Robert Stewart, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and other eminent authorities."

"There can be little doubt that these 'Studies,' which are published in separate keys for all voices, will share the popularity of the 'Exercises.'"—Sunday Times.
"We have no doubt that the second volume will equal the first in popularity."—Morning Post.
"I am glad to find you are still going ahead in your valuable sphere of work. The 'Voice-Training Studies' are a solid and sound contribution to the repertory of teachers and students."—Sir John Stainer.
"Your new book of 'Voice-Training Studies' is admirable, and will prove of very great value to students and teachers. I like it much."—C. Vincent, Mus. Doc.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH.

The English Translation and Adaptation by the REV. DR. TROUTBECK.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

Extract from Preface.

Thirty-three years have elapsed since the publication of the first English edition, and faithful to its original as that edition may have been in the main, it has been felt that closer adherence to the accepted standard text is attainable, and, as far as is at all practicable, should be attained. With this view the present edition is issued. The chorales, choruses, and solos have been newly and independently translated from the original German words, and the adaptation of the narrative of the Evangelist, a task rendered perhaps somewhat less difficult and hazardous by the aid of the Revised Version of the New Testament, has been carefully reconsidered and re-arranged so as to preserve unaltered, as far as may be, the musical text of the original.

"BETHLEHEM."

Dr. Mackenzie's work is described as "a Mystery." In the highest sense, the story of Christ's birth and its related incidents might be so called, but the term has here a more specific meaning. Mr. Bennett's book is a modification in point of form and style of the sacred dramas which, under the name of Mysteries, were a rough and often rather irreverent means of conveying Biblical instruction in long past times. As a rule, those early plays were purely dramatic, but they existed in various forms, and occasionally a kind of "chorus" was employed, to point the moral of the scenes represented, or to fill up blanks by narration. Such a device is used in the present case for descriptive purposes. Otherwise, action is represented in the ordinary form of dramatic oratorio, and a certain homeliness of expression in some instances serves to connect the modern "Mystery" with its ancient predecessors.

The book is divided into two Acts, or Parts, each being, for performing purposes, complete in itself, and adapted for separate representation. Of these the first deals with the appearance of the Angels to the Shepherds; the second with the homage paid by the Shepherds and the Eastern Kings to the Divine Babe.

Act I. opens with a description of the scene in the fields before the supernatural phenomena begin:

Darkness o'er the earth is brooding,
Silence reigns, no voice intruding
On the solemn midnight peace;
Wrapped are all the sheep in slumber,
'Neath the stars—a countless number,
Eyes that watch, and never cease.

An Angel appears in the sky, and the affrighted Shepherds call to one another:

O brothers, quick arise!
Above us, in the skies,
What flame of dreadful import blazes?

Soon they recognise—

One of those Whose place, in glittering rows,
Is near the throne of God eternal.

The celestial visitor bids them have no fear, and delivers his message in terms which are a free paraphrase of the Biblical text, with certain additions. Following comes the apparition of the Heavenly Host, described by the Shepherds as it develops:

O wondrous sight! with waving wings
The air is filled, and beauteous forms
Of lustrous sheen each moment brings
To view, as when, in time of storms,
Clouds upon clouds embattled rise,
And take their ordered place ere lightnings pierce the skies!

The Heavenly Host is also the Heavenly Choir:

See how the silver trumpets flash like fire!
How golden harps gleam soft in seraph hands!
While to their leader the celestial quire
Converge, and marshal all their vocal bands.

The anthem of the Angels follows, and at its close the celestial singers prepare to return to Heaven, while the enraptured Shepherds implore them to remain:

O leave us not, ye Shining Ones!
The heavenly light fast fades,
And shadows 'mong the glades
Resume their midnight reign.
Whence it hath trembling lain,
In deepest caverns, Darkness runs.

But the prayer is useless, and the Shepherds watch the Host pass through the gate of Heaven:

See how, like points of lessening light,
Through Heaven's gate they go,
In order, row on row;
While from eclipse of fear
The stars once more appear,
And o'er the world again broods night.

The Shepherds now discuss what they have seen. One recalls Jacob's vision of angels; another the horses and chariots of fire beheld by Elisha:

But we have seen the angels in array,
Like silver clouds, the midnight heavens emblaze!

It is proposed to go to Bethlehem, yet some lack faith:

Can helpless childhood Zion's strength restore?
And into fragments Rome's world-empire break?

In reply the prophecies are cited. This is decisive. The men prepare to return to the city, and, with some folk out of Bethlehem, sing a Carol:

Uplift a song of praise!
As in the ancient days,
A Prince sits high on Israel's throne.

With this elaborate number the first Act ends.

The second Act opens in Bethlehem, beginning with a chorus descriptive of the appearance of an Angel guard, headed by Gabriel, who directs the placing of his sentries round the Divine abode:

Comrades, a stable poor and mean
The palace is of our great King;
Around it some stand sentinel,
Thither let pass no evil thing;
Some circle in the air above
Lest our old foes be on the wing.

The scene changes to the interior of the stable, where the Mother sings to her Child. Here Coleridge's translation of a Latin verse copied by him from a German print is used, with the addition of a second stanza.

In the streets of Bethlehem, the Shepherds and some of the townsfolk seek the Babe. The latter are incredulous and when the story of the Heavenly Host is repeated they can only say—

But where is He, and where His throne?
Here is no palace for a King!
No royal Babe to us is known!

A woman of the city answers by telling of an infant just born to a daughter of the House of David:

While, at the birthing of her Child,
Strange sights and sounds observèd were,
As of some angels watching there,
And warding off all things defiled.

On this they set out for the place of portentous nativity.

Again the scene changes to the interior of the stable, where the adoring Mother worships the Divine Infant as the Shepherds and People enter. To her they tell the story of the Angels, and all join in an act of homage to the new-born Saviour. The Three Kings now appear:

Tell us where the King abideth,
He of majesty eternal;
He who, armed with might supernal,
O'er His foes to victory rideth.

They lay down their gifts:

Kingly tribute now we offer,
Child of the Star!
Gold and spices here we proffer,
Brought from afar.

The Trio ended, a second elaborate Finale closes the work, dwelling upon the happy change that shall transform the world:

And this is He shall tread in dust the crest
Of Hell's fierce lord;
Sheathing the flaming sword
That long hath barred return to Eden's rest.

The music of this work is, for the most part, modern, both as regards form and spirit. In the matter of its form there are two features necessarily to be indicated here. One is the continuance of the treatment, which never comes to rest because of purely musical reasons, but goes on until, as in a few instances, cessation is demanded by the nature of the incident, description, or reflection immediately concerned. This method is now almost universal in works of the kind, but here it does not stand in the way—and never need stand in the way—of fully and regularly developed pieces equivalent to the old-fashioned "numbers."

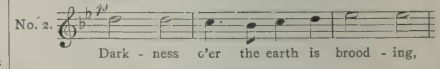
The second of the two features is more than commonly free, though by no means intricate and puzzling, employment of recurring or representative themes. Upon a certain number of motives having an applied significance relative to the story the entire composition rests, in so far as concerns its melodic structure. The chief of these motives will be indicated in the course of the following remarks.

The orchestral introduction seems intended chiefly to suggest the tranquillity of night. But it does more than this—anticipating, by use of a certain theme, the opening of the heavens for the passage of the angelic visitants. The motive in question consists of eight notes, repeated so as to have the 'effect of a chime:—

No. 1.

A solo tenor delivers the descriptive opening lines, his first phrase, on the words "Darkness o'er the earth is brooding"—

No. 2.



being adopted as representative of nocturnal gloom. Undeterred by possible charges of conventionality, the composer varies the description by use of the typical pastoral style so obviously suggested when reference is made to the sheep. But he employs his orchestra, noble and eloquent throughout, to a higher purpose when preluding the lines descriptive of the Angel's appearance. Here we find a new representative motive, brief but stately—which, with that of the opening heavens, forms the warp and woof of the instrumental texture as the voice describes the unfolding of celestial gates and the splendour flashing forth. Yet another theme presents itself, employed here in anticipation of the angelic "Gloria" presently to be sung—

No. 3.

No. 4.

The fright of the Shepherds is musically embodied in a subject (Allegro) not altogether free from suggestion of the grotesque—

No. 5.

This motive runs, in the orchestra, through the chorus of Shepherds, "O brothers, quick arise," sometimes in unison, at other times in canon. The vocal music, in two or four parts, takes an independent course, quasi-declamatory, but always with effective harmonies.

The Angel speaks comforting words in a soprano solo, opening with a natural reference to the Message theme, while the motive of Terror suggests the still present fright of the rustic hearers. A new subject is announced in the course of the solo, occurring on the words, "The world shall ring with loud acclaiming shout"—

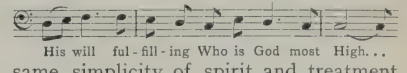
It recurs later, and now constitutes a leading feature of the number. Dr. Mackenzie seems to us at his best in treating the lines beginning "Though King of all, nor pomp nor show." We have here one of his long-drawn melodies for violins in octaves, richly accompanied by strings, wind, and harp. Into this tune the voice sometimes merges itself, sometimes passing away from it, but in all cases leaving it the supreme expression. The short instrumental passage which ends the number presents a subject already heard in another form—

It is that of the "Gloria" presently sung by the Heavenly Host.

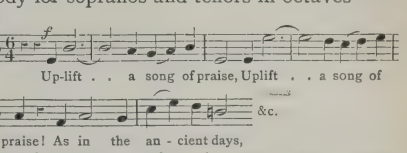
A second chorus of Shepherds, in which they describe the coming of the multitude of Angels, generally corresponds, as to its vocal music, with the first. The orchestra is kept busy throughout among the representative themes above indicated. We now reach the "Gloria"—one of the most scholarly and beautiful numbers in the work. It is written for two sopranos and an alto, with incidental soli for soprano and tenor, and has for central musical thought the motive shown in the last example above. This is always associated with the words "Glory to God," which frequently recur. The general style of the music here is imitative, approximating to that established by the older Church composers, while the orchestral accompaniment (wind), not compelled to deal with representative themes, is laid out for purely musical effect. It begins with the brass chiefly (three cornets, four horns and trombones), other instruments being added till, at the climax, the entire wind band is engaged. A harp and triangle lend their special colouring to the ensemble.

The Shepherds now describe the return of the Angels to Heaven, and, with this chorus, the orchestra resumes—shall we say?—its dramatic significance; presenting, as the words give occasion, the theme of Darkness and of the Message, together with reminiscences of the "Gloria" just heard. In the increased vivacity of the instruments we have, perhaps, a suggestion of the Shepherds' excitement as the supernatural manifestation comes to an end. The Shepherds next proceed to discuss what they have seen. First of all, a pastoral melody for English horn, on a pedal bass but otherwise unaccompanied, arrests attention. Its effect seems to be the limitation of the scene to the ordinary horizon of the humble actors, who judge of what has passed from that restricted outlook. The point d'orgue continuing, the First Shepherd opens conversation in homely strains, ending with a phrase more or less prominent throughout the number—

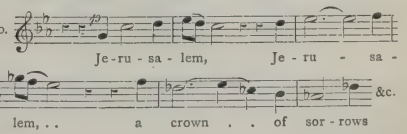


The same simplicity of spirit and treatment pervades the debate. Strings are chiefly used in accompaniment, with a continuous movement of parts, so carried on as to secure musical interest without injury to the prevailing dramatic idea. The number ends with a chorale, "The Word that now we see fulfilled, is ever sure," the full wind band accompanying.

The Finale of Act I. is a full chorus with incidental soli for soprano and tenor, "Uplift a song of praise." It opens with an extended melody for sopranos and tenors in octaves—



Other themes enter into its structure, among them that (Ex. 6) first heard in connection with the words, "The world shall ring with loud acclaiming shout," but now sung to "The expected Christ is here!" There is, also, a melody connected with the thought of Jerusalem as about to put on her beautiful garments—



These themes, and some episodical matter, serve for an ensemble of commanding effect. At the climax the leading subject is repeated in full choral unison, the entire orchestra accompanying, and, after the voices end, making jubilant reference to the Shepherds' Chorale and the motive of the Rejoicing World (Ex. 6).

The opening number of Act II. deals with the appearance of a heavenly legion to guard the birthplace of the Holy Child. It has an orchestral introduction in which the subjoined passage for solo cornet (unaccompanied) is played as directed—and should here be taken, perhaps, as a military "call." Later on, however, it is sung to the words "Shine forth, thou Sun," and thus has another, though, under the circumstances, not unrelated significance. Taking the chorus as a whole, its most prominent feature is a March, with which the orchestra accompanies the voices and suggests the presence and work of the angelic warriors. The motive of the Shepherds' Chorale occurs here and there with an obvious significance. From this scene of martial pomp to the interior of the Stable is a long step. Not only do we get an effective contrast, but also a delightful piece of music—the Mother's Cradle Song. The connected situation has often engaged the active sympathies of composers, rarely, however, with such felicitous results as in the present case. The melody, sung sotto voce and accompanied by muted strings, is exquisite in its tenderness, and set off by masterly orchestration, none the less effective because quiet and restrained. We next pass into the streets of Bethlehem, where the Shepherds and certain people of the place are enquiring for the Holy Babe. At once a recurring theme strikes the ear. It is announced by a horn, and has a kind of open-air effect, fitting it for close attendance upon the Shepherds throughout the scene :—

No. 12.

Here, too, the motive of the discussion in the field comes up for further use. The people, more than a little incredulous, ask for the story of the Angels, and the First Shepherd replies in a solo, mainly pastoral in character, but animated withal, and culminating, as the heat of conviction waxes high, in an outburst of rejoicing and thankfulness. During this solo, by the way, the Message theme recurs in an ingeniously varied shape—

No. 13.

The people ask, "But where is He, and where His throne?" A woman speaks of a child born to a daughter of the House of David, and the scene ends with a brief but enthusiastic full chorus, founded on the subject with which the Shepherd closed his solo.

Once more in the Stable, we hear the melody of the Cradle Song breathed softly from the flutes. The Mother again sings—but now of vanishing darkness and returning day, of her love and gratitude, and her sense of awe and mystery. In this solo the music is intensely earnest and expressive, and, if not so immediately attractive as the lyrical beauty of the Cradle Song, has a charm of its own. The theme of the solo and chorus in the previous scene heralds the arrival of Shepherds and People, and attends upon the first question and answer of the visitors and the Mother. Once more the First Shepherd describes the celestial apparition in the fields, his music being chiefly built upon the motive connected with the Opening Heavens (Ex. 1). Coming to the quoted words of the Angel, "Good news to you," &c., the violas have that subject—which forms, so to speak, the basis of the whole musical structure. The workmanship will be recognised as exceedingly clever and ingenious. When the Mother, having heard the story, invokes with grateful heart the God of Israel, anticipating, like a pious Jewess, the emancipation and final triumph of her people, various themes, now familiar, are recalled, among them that of the Opening Heavens, that heard on the words "Shine forth, thou Sun" (Ex. 11), and that of Jerusalem (Ex. 10). From the exultant solo we pass to an ensemble, "O Holy Babe! O Majesty Divine!" full of rich harmonic effects and glowing colour. But it is not upon vocal music that the composer depends for a climax to this scene. The Mother, Shepherds, and People are supposed to kneel in silent adoration around the Manger, while an eloquent orchestra gives expression to feelings which might well be too deep for words, employing the melody just sung—

No. 15.
A complete musical change now takes place. The Three Kings are approaching with their gifts and homage, heralded by an Eastern March in which Dr. Mackenzie has used Indian scales and rhythms, limiting his orchestra at the outset to English horn, bassoon, strings, and a side drum with loose snares. An idea of the melody may be gathered from the extract subjoined—

No. 16. Alla marcia.
Other instruments join till, finally, the entire band is at work. An Eastern character is preserved throughout the scene ensuing—scales with "augmented seconds" being used, for example—and the whole of this music, coming just when it does, appeals to us with freshness of interest and variety of effect. The final number now appears. It is a quartet and chorus worthy—alike in character and dimensions—to sum up the "wondrous story" All available force is put into it, but not to the end of mere sonority. A note of genuine gladness and even of prophetic enthusiasm rings loud and true throughout the piece. A large and lofty spirit prevails.

By means of the foregoing sketch we have sought to convey a general idea of the scope and structure of "Bethlehem." There will be much more to say after the first performance of the work by the Royal Choral Society on April 12.

FROM MY STUDY.

I have much pleasure in presenting this month, a portrait of George Aspull. The average reader—of course not you, Sir or Madam—exclaims: "And who was George Aspull?" I will answer the question.

In the early years of the present century, George Aspull's father carried some business or other up to the point of failure, and then took to the violin for a living, becoming by dint of perseverance a respectable performer and, it is said, an intelligent teacher of his art. To this man, in 1814, was born a son, the inheritor of his taste and skill, and something more which came direct from the Dispenser of gifts. Manchester had the honour of being the child's birthplace. It may seem strange conduct in a prodigy, but we find it on record that, during the first five years of his life, little George showed no predilection for music. Afterwards, the fire of genius began to burn; making known to the watchful and exulting father that a treasure had been confided to his care. Mr. Aspull at once abandoned the public exercise of his profession, devoting the whole of his time and energy to the training of the wonder-child. The results were astonishing enough to warrant a public exhibition of the boy on his reaching the age of eight, and soon, as a matter of course, he was brought to London, where, in 1823, he played upon the pianoforte to Clementi, and a year later performed before the King and Royal Family at Windsor Castle. The following account of young Aspull's doings in the Court circle appeared in 1825:—

I am your affectionate Son
George Aspull

"In February, Master Aspull was introduced to his Majesty and a party of distinguished personages at Windsor, when he delighted the company for two hours with his performances. He played many of the most difficult compositions on the pianoforte, with a power of execution scarcely exceeded by the most experienced professors, and with a taste and feeling which no practice alone can give. The King, during the whole performance, expressed his most unqualified delight and bestowed upon this interesting boy that encouragement and commendation which, to the friends of this phenomenon, are doubly valuable from his Majesty's exalted rank and scientific knowledge; and, as the greatest proof of his Majesty's opinion of him, he commanded his attendance at the Castle the following evening, to have another opportunity of witnessing his powers. The Princess Augusta was equally astonished and delighted by the genius of this child and condescendingly turned over the leaves of his books during the whole performance. In addition to his display on the pianoforte, Master Aspull sang four songs in a style which called forth the most enthusiastic plaudits."

From the same writer I gather that the boy used to stand, not sit, at the instrument, that being the position in which he had the most perfect command. He could not span an octave without depressing the wrist, but this did not prevent him from "conquering the most complex and rapid passages that have ever appeared in the form of musical composition." It is also asserted that "with some slight allowance only for those passages requiring greater strength than that to which his little frame is adequate, or combining more distant intervals than his fingers can possibly command, there is no difficulty of execution that can stop him for a moment." An example is given: "He has made himself master of a piece of most singular difficulty, by a foreign composer whose name is Czerny, who wrote it as a trial of skill for all the eminent professors of Europe, and in order to combine all the mechanical niceties of execution of which the instrument is susceptible." Nothing came amiss to this "marvellous boy." But he could do more than reproduce the thoughts of others. He was fond of extempore playing, "at which, if permitted to do so, he will pass hours, and with a fluency that would indicate musical notes to be the vehicle by which he could best express his ideas." Of his singing, already mentioned, it is said that, while his voice was thin and weak, he used it with peculiar taste and delicacy of expression. Finally, the contemporary writer says: "His appearance and behaviour do not differ from those of other children at the same age; but his manner, when performing at the pianoforte, is that of a person deeply attentive. The most rapid and involved passages do not produce a change of countenance or any sign of effort. Little study is requisite even for the most elaborate pieces, and those of ordinary difficulty he can execute at once, on being permitted to cast his eye over them before taking his station at the pianoforte.

There is hardly need to say that the gifted and, because of his endowments, unfortunate, lad was made a public show for the sake of the money paid to see and hear him. In 1825 he was taken to Paris and, afterwards, through the British Islands; the premature exertion and excitement having their natural effect upon a sensitive frame in which, from the first, seeds of disease probably existed. Be this as it may, George Aspull, having caught cold at the funeral of Clementi, fell into a decline, and died at Leamington on August 20, 1832, in his nineteenth year. A volume of pianoforte music and songs composed by him was published after his death.

Alfred Crowquill's drawing of Mr. Sims Reeves as he was in 1849 will recall to elderly amateurs a once familiar apparition. The portrait was published when the famous tenor made a figure upon the lyric stage. It will be remembered by the amateurs aforesaid that Mr. Reeves entered upon his operatic career as leading tenor at Drury Lane in December, 1847; that he appeared at Her Majesty's in 1848, and at Covent Garden in 1849.

There are many portraits of "Kitty" Stephens, who charmed the amateurs of these islands in opera-house or concert-room from 1813 till 1835. Some of these are much more often met with than others, and I have selected for reproduction an example which is, perhaps, as little familiar as any. The piquant features and animated expression are well caught by the artist. Catherine Stephens, the daughter of a carver and gilder resident in Park Street, Grosvenor Square, was born September 18, 1794, and began studying singing, under Lanza, at the age of thirteen. Five years later she was popular as a concert artist at various watering-places to which she was taken by her master. Not long afterwards Lanza received his dismissal and was replaced by Welch, who so used his influence that an opening was given her at Covent Garden, where she first appeared (September 23, 1813) as Mandane in "Artaxerxes." "She was now nineteen," says a biographer, "her figure, of medium height, was pretty, but inclined to embonpoint; her hair and eyes were dark, and, though not, strictly speaking, handsome, her countenance had an indescribable fascination, owing to the ingenuous simplicity and unaffected sweetness of her nature. Her manner in private life was artless and she was blithe and joyous as a child. . . . The tones of her voice were rich and dulcet and captivated the ear; its quality was full and liquid beyond that of any other singer in England; its volume was such that it could be distinctly heard above the band and chorus, and its compass reached to the high D." According to Mr. Husk (in Grove's Dictionary) her execution was not very remarkable for brilliancy; she rather lacked dramatic instinct and power, and her enunciation was very bad, but she excelled in the expression of quiet devotional feeling and simple pathos. This means that "Kitty" was before all a lyric singer, and accounts for the special success that attended her in ballads. I cannot here give the details of Miss Stephens' professional career; let it be noted, however, that in 1830 she was earning £5,000 per annum—a large sum when salaries were not as they are now. This money she prudently dealt with. In point of fact, Miss Stephens possessed what may be called wealth before the Earl of Essex, a would-be gallant bridegroom of eighty-two, sought and won her hand. The venerable lord did not long enjoy the society of his wife. Married in March, 1838, he died in April, 1839, leaving the Countess with a splendid jointure and a house in Belgrave Square, which she inhabited till her death on February 22, 1882. Till within a short time of her decease, the Countess of Essex was frequently seen at the Opera. Few, however, out of her own "set," knew her, or associated the unobtrusive old lady with, perhaps, the most brilliant period of vocal art in England.

Seeing, the other day, a reference to Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," I was led to consult such authorities as stood immediately at hand upon the history and artistic exemplification of the grim idea which associates the King of Terrors with instruments of revelry. The task, if not cheerful, proved interesting enough to warrant me in touching upon its subject here.

The preface-writer to an undated edition of "The Dance of Death; Painted by H. Holbein and engraved by W. Hollar," observes with regard to the origin of such lugubrious designs: "The origin of all these is, perhaps, to be sought for in an antient pageant, or religious farce, invented by the clergy for the purpose of at once amusing and keeping the people in ignorance. In this all ranks and conditions of life were personated and mixed together in a general dance, in the course of which everyone in his turn vanished from the scene, to show that none were exempted from the stroke of death. This dance was performed in the churches, and can be traced back as far as the year 1424; it was called the Dance of Macaber, from a German poet of that name who first composed some verses under the same title. Of this person very little is known, but Fabricius thinks the poem more ancient than the paintings." Accepting this statement—and none carries with it greater authority or seems more probable—it is interesting to make acquaintance with Macaber's verses, an English translation* of which is now before me. The translation was made by John Lydgate, at the expense of Jenken Carpenter, Town Clerk of London (1430), executor of Richard Whittington; and the verses accompanied a representation of the Dance of Death on the walls of a cloister attached to the metropolitan cathedral. The cloister, paintings, verses and all were demolished and swept away by order of the Protector Somerset, in 1549.

* The Daunce of Machabree: wherein is lively expressed and shewed The State of Manne, and how he is called at uncertain tymes by Death, and when he thinketh least thereon: Made by Dan John Lydgate, Monke of S. Edmunds Bury.

Lydgate wrote a metrical introduction, from which I take a single stanza:

O Creatures, ye that been reasonable,
The life desiring which is eternal,
Ye may seen here doctrine full notable
Your life to lead, which that is mortal,
Thereby to learn in special,
How ye shall trace the Daunce of Machabree
To man and woman ylike natural,
For Death nee spareth high nor low degree.

The form of Macaber's work is this: Death visits a representative of each class of society and, in an eight-line stanza, summons him to the tomb; the victim replying in a similar stanza. A single example will suffice. The grisly figure calls upon a Princess:

Death Speaketh to the Princess.

Come forth anon, my lady good Princess,
Ye must also gone upon this daunce,
Nought may avail your great strangeness,
Neither your beauty nor your gret pleasaunce,
Your rich aray, neither your dalliance,
That whilom couth so many hold in bond.
In love for all your double variance
Yet mot as now this footing understond.

The Princess maketh Answer.

Alas, I see there is none other boot,
Death hath in earth no Lady nor Mastres,
And on this daunce yet mot I nedes fate,
For there nis Queen, Countess ne Dutchess
Flouring in bounty, nor in her fayrness
That shode of Death mot pass the passage,
When our beauty and counterfeit fairness
Dieth, adue then our rimpled age.

Apart from use of the word "dance," there is no suggestion of music, but the various artists who, at different times and in various places, undertook to paint the scenes, eagerly seized upon the grim notion of a fiddling, piping Death, as I shall now show.

Among the most ancient pictorial representations of the Dance of Macaber is that in the Dominican Convent at Basle, a full description of which I have in a work entitled "La Danse des Morts, come elle est depeinte dans la louable Ville de Basle, pour servir d'un Miroir de la Nature humaine, dessinée et gravée sur l'Original de feu Mr. Matthieu Merian. A Basle, chez Jean Rodolphe Im-Hof, 1756." It is a volume almost grotesque in Gothic horrors. On the title-page Death is seen cutting down men and women with a sword, or, with a hideous grin on his fleshless countenance, trampling human beings beneath his feet, or pursuing on a white horse, equipped with lance, helmet, and shield. But with these representations I have nothing to do, being concerned to note that the mediæval painter of Basle (a nameless artist) over and over again depicts Death as escorting victims to the sound of his own music. In the introductory tableau, two Deaths, standing on coffins, are blowing pipe and beating drum before a little wayside chapel full of skulls. The monster leads a Pope to the sound of a march played upon a skull with a thigh bone. He pipes merrily to a melancholy Emperor; uses for a King a kind of herald's trumpet, to which is appended a small banner, bearing the "strange device" of a skull; and he hands along a Duchess while twanging a species of lute. A physician marches graveward to the sound of a slender pipe; a Hermit steps to the noise made by two thigh bones upon a lantern, and a musician, carrying a broken wind instrument, is escorted by a very lively Death, having a salt-box and stick in front of him and playing on a fiddle. "Our dance of death is still imperfect," says he, "we want a performer on the clairon. Come along." A Fool is summoned by a Death in cap and bells; and a Pagan woman marches in rear of another to the noise of a bagpipe. Thus does the weird fancy of the artist associate comedy and tragedy, with a true Middle Age relish for making extremes in life touch each other.

The designs of Holbein, engraved by Hollar, are on much the same lines. A dancing Death plays a fiddle before Adam and Eve as they are expelled from Eden; another beats a tambourine in advance of bride and bridegroom; and one plays a trumpet-marine while a companion places bony hands upon a poor pedlar. An old man follows, like a little child, the sound of a dulcimer, and an aged woman is equally attracted by the music of a xylophone.

In Part IV. of "Engravings and Woodcuts by Old Masters, reproduced in Fac-simile by the Imperial Press at Berlin, and published under the direction of Dr. Friedrich Lippmann," there is an "Alphabet of Death" attributed to Hans Holbein the Younger (designer) and Lützelburger, by whom the letters were cut. These little gems are not much bigger than a postage stamp, but each contains a capital letter, backed by a more or less elaborate representation of an incident in the Danse des Morts. One of the designs, besides being terribly suggestive, is grossly indecent according to modern notions; I am, however, not concerned to go beyond the relationship of music to the dance. In A there are two Deaths and no victim. The skeleton figures are opening the ball with sound of pipe and tambourine. G shows a Death playing his pipe over a struggling woman whom his associate appears to be strangling. In I we have a musician writhing on the ground, holding a flageolet in his right hand, while Death, with a mocking smile, blows air into his mouth through a bellows. Nothing can exceed the terrible force of these tiny cuts, and nowhere else, to my knowledge, is the "last enemy" shown at work in such furious fashion. The victims, in nearly all cases, appear as struggling against an irresistible fate.

One other series remains for notice here. I refer to the "English Dance of Death," by Rowlandson, published by Ackerman in 1816, and styled English for the reason that the artist deals with phases of life in his native country. These pictures have the advantage of colour and also of the grotesque fancy of a humorist who could at the same time be very horrible indeed. The frontispiece, showing a crowned Death seated on a terrestrial globe, dart in hand, a tambourine and pipe hanging close to his head, while lethal weapons, combustibles and poisons litter the ground all about, is one of the most impressive compositions of the kind known to me. Like in character and power is the vignette on the title-page. There skeletons are dancing wildly under the shadow of a ruined church; one capering apart as he plays a flageolet, the others being in groups of four, three of them beating tambourines. Having made this concession to ancient treatment of the subject, Rowlandson takes his own course. His Deaths are represented as doing many strange things suggested by a powerful fancy and depicted with a graphic pencil, but he avoids connecting his ghastly hero with music, save in one plate, where a young lady, taking a dancing lesson, is joined by Death as a partner, to the horror of the professor, who is making off, kit and all. A guitar is supported by a couch close at hand. In Coombe's attendant verse we read:—

One vernal morn, with great delight
She practised for the approaching night.
Some new invented step she paces,—
The teacher played off his grimaces,
And while he boasted to impart
Some added beauties of his art,
She sinks, she faints, she pants for breath:
Alas! it was the Waltz of Death.

The application of music to the grotesquely horrible is a device of the dark ages. Debased in origin, unpleasant in effect, why revive it? X.

"MUSICAL TIMES" INTERVIEWS.

No. II.—MR. F. H. COWEN ON OPERA.

Public appreciation of the first "Musical Times Interview," has exceeded even the sanguine anticipations we had allowed ourselves to form. Dr. Mackenzie's views on opera, besides bringing us a number of letters, in which we are thanked for having been the means of making them known, have been quoted and commented on by the daily and weekly press in all parts of the kingdom. An investigation of the principles which regulate the union of music and drama being at the present day of great importance, we have thought it well to elicit the opinions of other eminent specialists on this subject before proceeding to another. Accordingly we have to-day the pleasure of placing before our readers those of Mr. F. H. Cowen, whose "Signa," produced so recently at Milan, is soon to be submitted to the judgment of a London audience.

Composers as a rule are not fond of theorising. They produce, and leave to others the task of explaining. Mr. Cowen is no exception to this—has, indeed, even less liking for theories than the rest of his kind. It will, nevertheless, be found that his replies yield plenty of material for the serious consideration of thoughtful minds: the lightness of touch apparent here and there will be recognised by all who know the speaker, as thoroughly characteristic.

"Which is the more important in an opera—the music or the drama?"

"If I am not to be misunderstood, I shall have to answer this question from two points of view—actual and ideal. I am not altogether in sympathy with the taste of the present day. No doubt the success of an opera depends, now, more on the merits of its drama than of its music. But is this altogether logical? Is it an ideal condition of things? Does it not seem rather absurd that one of the most important of musical forms—for opera is this, most certainly—should depend rather on another art than on music for its success? Yet such undoubtedly is the case, and I cannot help thinking this state of things is due to the insufficient musical training of our public. If operatic audiences were more musical they would not allow so much of their attention to be absorbed by the drama. At present, given a strong subject, and the music may be comparatively trivial; whereas, let opposite conditions obtain and failure is certain. Is this fair? Surely, if a weak libretto have power to nullify the success of good music, comparatively mediocre music ought equally to have the effect of nullifying a good libretto. But it hasn't—and music suffers in consequence. Some of the most beautiful music is practically dead, and a good deal that might be better flourishes—not by reason of its own merits, but because it has got itself luckily married! From sacrificing the drama to the music (or, rather, to the singers) we have gone to the other extreme and sacrificed the music to the drama. At least, we might consent to their being placed on an equality! My ideal opera, however, I confess, is one of which the prominent feature would be music."

"What would be the essential features of your ideal libretto?"

"Well, for one thing, the story should be intelligible without the aid of words—as, for instance, in a good ballet d'action. The subject should appeal strongly to the feelings, and should yield, quite naturally, a succession of scenes or situations calling for reasonably extended musical expression. It has already been pointed out by Dr. Mackenzie that the action of a play that is to be sung—i.e., an opera—will necessarily be slower than that of one that is to be spoken, and so it should be; but it seems to me that the tendency of ultra-modern opera is to move more quickly than a play, and that is precisely one of the things I do not like. But everybody now-a-days is in a hurry. The scenes, incidents, and motives of my ideal opera libretto would be broadly outlined—conceived with a view to their easy comprehension even without verbal aid. The libretto of a good dramatic cantata, as now understood, is not a bad illustration of what I mean; but of course scenic requirements would have to be far more carefully provided for in a work intended for the theatre."

"What kind of subjects do you consider best suited for opera—mythical, legendary, historical, or domestic?"

"Those which I would like to call the Romantic-domestic kind seem to me to be best suited for modern opera. Subjects, for instance, in which the supernatural is blended with strong human interest. We have examples in 'Der Freischütz,' 'Faust,' 'Lohengrin,' the 'Flying Dutchman.' Tragic operas are generally more effective than those with happy endings; but of course there are many excellent libretti the plots of which end happily—'Fidelio,' for instance, and 'Sonnambula.' I believe that subjects like these—treated on modern lines as regards form—would be successful. The present rage for subjects of a tempestuous kind will, I fancy, not last long. Violent paroxysms must, in the very nature of things, exhaust themselves quickly. Historical events may, with perfect propriety, play a secondary part in a libretto—may form a background, as it were, or help to give local colour; and no doubt a really great historical character might be made the chief subject of a libretto, with good results, provided the period were sufficiently remote and the individuality of the character not too well known. Queen Elizabeth, for instance, would not do—nor Henry VIII. But perhaps it will be said that great remoteness turns the historical into the legendary. I have a great liking for subjects of the kind known as the 'Poetical Idyll,' with or without supernatural interest. A love interest, however, is de rigueur. An opera without strong love interest is, I consider, a decided mistake. It by no means follows that a strong subject means a strong libretto—and this is often forgotten. A strong subject may be weakly handled by the librettist, and, on the other hand, a gifted writer may make a strong drama out of the most unpromising subject-matter."

"How far should the musical treatment of an opera depend upon the class of subject?"

"Well, in the works of composers of the past, there is not much difference between their treatment of one libretto and another. In this respect modern composers are more particular. Melody, harmony, rhythm, orchestration should, of course, be appropriate to the emotions expressed in the libretto; but as the same emotions might appear in subjects otherwise very different, I do not see how any music can so belong to a subject that it would not fit another. The expression of music is not definite enough for that. By association, of course, certain music may identify itself with a subject—for instance, we cannot now imagine the music of 'Lohengrin' in connection with any other subject."

"What number of acts do you think best for an opera?"

"Oh! seeing the present tendency, I am seriously thinking of writing an opera in less than one act. Brevity has long been recognised as the soul of wit, but in the present day people want it to be the soul of everything else too. All through life it is the same. We are jaded—we want continual stimulation—we want all our emotions at once. Is this high pressure to last? I, for one, devoutly hope not. If the requirements of art, rather than those of the public are considered, the number of acts in an opera should depend entirely on the subject. If it be strong enough and seems naturally to require six acts for its proper development and completion, it ought to have them. If one act is too much, then don't write the opera at all! I see no reason why, under proper conditions, two acts should not be made as effective as any other number. In a three-act opera the public is almost sure to pick out one act as being the weakest. With two, this risk is minimised. A two-act libretto cannot develop much in the first act and the second is therefore almost bound to be the stronger. I do not regard any particular number of acts as an ideal form, however—the subject must decide."

"Do you believe in the 'Leitmotif' system?"

"Yes, but not when carried so far as we see it in Wagner's later works. I like it to be suggestive and reminiscent. It is also, I may tell you in confidence, very useful—to the composer. When in doubt, play Leitmotif—but I am revealing secrets of the trade!"

"Should the music of an opera be continuous (as, for instance, in Wagner) or divided into separate numbers?"

"More or less continuous; not to the extent it is carried by Wagner, but with occasional pauses to give relief to the ear. The division of an opera into numbers, however, does not necessarily imply that these are detached; it may be made for the sake of convenience (in rehearsing, &c.). At the same time, it is only fair to remember that some of the most successful modern operas—such as 'Faust' and 'Carmen'—have been written in absolutely detached numbers. Personally, I advocate the continuous system, with, as I have said occasional places for the ear to rest on."

"Which should predominate—voice or orchestra?"

"The voice. Let the orchestration be as modern in treatment and style and as full of good workmanship as you like; but it should never obtrude on the ear while the character on the stage is singing anything important."

"What distinguishes 'Dramatic' from other music?"

"One important characteristic of Dramatic music is that everything is laid on with a much coarser brush, so to speak—the effects are broader, cruder, stronger. Much as scene-painting differs from work exhibited in a picture gallery, so music for the theatre differs from that intended for the concert-room. In an opera you do not want the polyphonic detail of a symphony, for instance. The rapid transitions which break up symmetry are naturally often required, but I do not think this constitutes, or is indeed essential to, dramatic music. Music can surely be dramatic in expression while, at the same time, symmetrical in form!"

"Do you approve the use of 'local colour' in operatic music?"

"If the locality be an important feature of the subject—yes!—not otherwise. There are only a few such 'colours' that can be safely used, and these are obtained mainly by imitating peculiarities of folk-song. If used discreetly, however, they are decidedly effective."

"Which, in your opinion, is the greatest opera?"

"On the principle that there are only two kinds of music, good and bad, a great opera is a great opera, and there is no greatest—comparisons are 'odorous.' As well ask who is the greatest composer—though in that case I should certainly be tempted to say F. H. Cowen!!"

"As to spoken dialogue in opera—do you approve it? And do you like it when accompanied by the orchestra?"

"I do not like spoken dialogue in opera at all. The transition from music to speech and from speech to music is so abrupt that, to me, it is always like a slap in the face. It is true that in a juvenile indiscretion I once committed—an opera named 'Pauline'—spoken dialogue occurs, but we won't speak of that. In comic opera of course spoken dialogue may pass. I mean 'comic opera' in our sense, not French opéra comique—that, I must confess, I always think improved when the dialogue has been set to music. Just one occasional word or phrase spoken instead of sung, to give special emphasis, may be effective, but that is all."

"What special gifts are required in a composer of opera?"

"The most important gifts—taking for granted the power, natural or acquired, of writing an opera at all, of using an orchestra skilfully, and so on—are:

"1. The gift of melody.

"2. The power of expressing the various emotions of human life by means of music—so far, at least, as the art permits.

"3. The gift of interesting the public without lowering himself.

"4. The gift of knowing a good libretto when he sees one, and even being able to plan one, though not able to write it.

"5. The gift of finding an impresario willing to produce his operas and a publisher willing to bring them out—and pay for them!"

The "History of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, Massachusetts," of which Vol. I.—prepared by Messrs. C. C. Perkins and J. S. Dwight, and recording the Society's doings from its origin in 1815 to the close of its seventy-fifth season in 1890—has just been issued, contains much curious reading. The book opens with an interesting sketch of the progress of choral music in New England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from which it appears that during the second and third decades of the latter much opposition was made by the unco' guid to the introduction of singing "by note" instead of "by ear." Among the objections urged were "that the next thing will be to pray by rule and preach by rule, and then comes popery; that it savours of witchcraft to sing a tune by following printed characters with the eye without having first learned it by ear (!); that singing by note will bring about the use of instruments; that the names of the notes are blasphemous (!)" and so on. The contest raged for twenty years, but Boston having, in 1820, set the example, the practice of singing by note was gradually adopted even in the country towns. That entire absence of a sense of humour revealed in the objections just given is further shown by the text of some of the hymns sung—with perfect gravity—at that time. Here is a specimen:

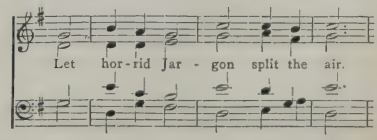
Ye monsters of the bubbling deep,
Your Maker's praises shout;
Up from the sands, ye codlings peep,
And wag your tails about.

An extraordinary influence was obtained, at the end of the eighteenth century, by William Billings, a tanner, on whom falls the distinction of being "the first native self-taught American Composer." He is thus described by one who knew him intimately: "He was somewhat deformed in person, blind of one eye, with one leg shorter than the other, and with a withered arm. His voice was stentorian and his habits repulsive. He used to carry snuff in his waistcoat pocket and take it by the handful." This eccentric worthy composed the tune "Chester," called "the Battle Hymn of the Revolution," the only one the Continental pipers were allowed to play when on the march.

The aim of Billings was, to quote his own words, "to tickle the ear, to rouse the attention dulled by the drawling tunes of past times. My music has more than twenty times the power of the old slow tunes; each part straining for mastery and victory, the audience entertained and delighted, their minds surprisingly agitated and fluctuated, sometimes declaring for one part, sometimes for another. . . . Oh, ecstatic! Rush on, ye sons of Harmony." "And rush on they did!" adds Mr. Perkins. "The chorus," says Channing, "chewed the tune and swallowed the words," and a practical illustration of the effect was furnished one evening when a couple of cats were hung by their hind legs over the shop sign at the composer's door, on which "Billings's Music" was conspicuously inscribed. Censured for his use of discords, Billings published a tune called "Jargon" set to these words:

Let horrid Jargon split { the / my } air / ear
And rive { the / my } nerves asunder;
Let baleful discord split the ear,
As terrible as thunder.

Here are the first four bars of this (de)composition:—



(the rest is to match); and here are the directions for its adequate performance: "Let an Ass bray the Bass, let the filing of a Saw carry the Tenor, let a Hog who is extremely hungry squeal the Counter, and let a Cartwheel which is heavy loaded, and that has been long without grease, squeak the Treble."

Billings published six collections of hymn-tunes, mostly of his own making, and "through sheer impudence kept the New Englanders under his yoke for more than a quarter of a century," a period known as the Dark Age of music in New England. In 1786 was founded the Stoughton Musical Society, notable as the first organisation of the kind in America. At least a dozen others—among which the Massachusetts Musical Society deserves special mention on account of the elevation of its aims—came into existence within the next twenty years, and prepared the way for the now famous "Handel and Haydn," which gave its first Concert, consisting of the first part of the "Creation" and a number of airs and choruses from "The Messiah," "Judas," and "Israel," on Christmas night, 1815. From that time to the end of 1890 the Society had given 675 Concerts; never less than one, and as many as twenty-two in one year; had held nine Festivals in Boston, and taken part in three in New York, besides assisting at various public ceremonials of national importance. Appended is the number of performances given during this period of a few of the most important works:—"The Messiah," 82; "Samson," 33; "Judas," 17; "Israel," 8; "Creation," 63; "Elijah," 47; "St. Paul," 14; "Hymn of Praise," 19; Bach's "Passion," 8; Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," 13; "Choral Symphony," 7; Spohr's "Last Judgment," 9; Gounod's "Redemption," 5; Rossini's "Moses," 45; "Stabat Mater," 27. In the annual address for 1890 the President, Mr. A. Parker Browne, expressed his belief "that our fund will increase to such figures that we need never have to think of a work proposed for performance, 'Will it pay expenses?" but only 'Is it the right thing to do?" Admirable; but a consummation even more devoutly to be wished is that the two considerations should become identical.

Among the literary curiosities enshrined in the volume is the following letter, which Mr. Perkins solemnly avers he received during his last year of office:—

Clarksburg (Va.),
July 27, 1850.

Messrs. Handell and Hayden.

Gentlemen,—Hearing from a gentleman lately from Boston that you were the instructors of a musical society in that place I take the liberty of addressing you a few lines for the purpose of obtaining some information regarding your Society, and you will please excuse the liberty I have taken, as I am an entire stranger to you. I wish to know the terms upon which you take scholars for instruction, and whether you take any for their services who have not the means to pay for their tuition. I have thought lately of cultivating my taste for music, which I think is very good, or at least tolerably good. The first time I attempted, I could play a tune on the violin, and in three or four days I could play most any tune I knew except some difficult waltzes or reels. I can play on the flute as well, or very nearly as well, as our best performers, and some of them have been to our fashionable watering-places playing. Besides playing on several bass instruments, on the accordion and the piano, but I never tried the piano but once, and I played a tune on it then. I can play some ten or twelve instruments altogether. Please let me hear from you soon, and if your terms suit, I can give you most any number of certificates of my musical talents. Awaiting your answer.—I remain, yours faithfully, ———.

For the suppression of his name this genius has to thank the charity of Mr. Perkins. His friends also have reason to be grateful.

A long and interesting interview with Mr. Edward Lloyd appears in the current number of the Strand Magazine. The article contains a number of illustrations, among them being portraits of Mr. Lloyd's father and mother. The former, Richard Lloyd, also a tenor, held a vicar choralship in Westminster Abbey; his wife was a daughter of J. L. Hopkins, a professor of music in the Royal household of George IV. She gained a King's scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music for pianoforte playing when only seventeen. At seven years of age little Edward became a Westminster choirboy under James Turle, who took him under his special care, and procured him his first engagements. It is amusing to read that at twenty years of age Mr. Lloyd sang at a church in Belsize Park for thirty pounds a year. Then his uncle, Dr. J. L. Hopkins, Organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, gave him a post in the choir there at £120 per annum. There was a trial for the post, however, and at this Mr. Lloyd sang "If with all your hearts." Here is a confession from his own lips: "I felt on that morning just the same as I do now, when about to fulfil any engagement I may have on hand: anxious, fearfully anxious." Of his first important engagement, when he sang in Bach's "Passion" Music at a Gloucester Festival, Mr. Lloyd says: "There were 2,000 people present. It did me a lot of good. I was very nervous, and my nervousness gave birth to feeling. A cold singer is no good!" Mr. Lloyd has, of course, exceptional opportunities for studying the bent of public taste. "Oratorios," he remarks, "still hold their old power over the public; . . . In Chicago, where we sang "The Messiah" twice, there were over 5,000 people at each performance; but if you want to really understand how these glorious works are loved and revered, go into the Black Country on the occasion of a big musical gathering, and watch the masses come in with their music-scores under their arms. I have seen the galleries crowded with miners, who drink in every note, and applaud in the right places too." Mr. Lloyd has often been asked to sing in opera, but has always declined, and tells us that he has never regretted his decision. He has made but one appearance in costume in his life, when he took part in a performance of Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" at the late Mr. Henry Littleton's house in Belsize Park, on July 7, 1871. It may interest our readers if we supplement the information given in the interview by saying that the cast on that occasion included Miss Emily Spiller (Lisbeth), Miss Sabilla Novello (Ursula), Mr. Thurley Beale (Kauz), Mr. Alfred Bell (The Mayor), and Mr. Charles Fry (Martin). Mr. (now Sir) Joseph Barnby and Mr. Willem Coenen were at the pianoforte. Mr. Barnby conducted, and the stage manager was Mr. Alfred Littleton.

It is on record that Mr. Paderewski spoke or wrote a certain sentence in praise of the instruments to which he accords his preference. Now, this important utterance is already extant in two versions. In certain programmes both readings appear on different pages. The question is, did Mr. Paderewski say "Play only upon an Erard whenever obtainable," or "I play only upon an Erard wherever obtainable"? Passing over the different readings in regard to the penultimate word (though nothing can be unimportant in dealing with such a subject as this), it remains to be decided whether the mood of the original sentence was indicative or imperative. If the pianist merely stated that he plays always upon an Erard, the fact is so patent to mankind that the dictum seems hardly necessary, and therefore we are compelled to suspect a hidden meaning. On this assumption, it is not impossible that "wherever obtainable" contains the gist of the remark, and we are to believe that if he sees an Erard pianoforte anywhere—in a shop, or being carried through the streets in a van—he is immediately seized with the desire of performing upon it. What traps might be set by clever persons in society who grudge their guineas for stalls if they were to have their Erards brought into the hall and the door artfully left ajar! No sooner does Mr. Paderewski appear in the street than they are sure of hearing him for nothing. The pianoforte is "obtainable," and they are bound to have a recital in their own home. If, on the other hand, the mood be imperative, and the artist has really issued a command to the world to play on nothing but Erards, what a noble vision rises upon the imagination—of the British public hewing their Broadkinsons and Kirkcollwoods into firewood, despatching their Bechsteinways and Blüthmayers to their various countries, and then trooping to Marlborough Street to obey the mandate. Which of these dreams is to be realised? None but Mr. Paderewski, or the fortunate person to whom the remark was addressed, can tell us. We await with impatience the issue of a really authorised version of the text.

We remember reading in a book by Max Adeler about a man who invented a scheme for making Patent Office reports interesting. This scheme (which was accomplished by working the various inventions into an interminable penny romance) has been paralleled in sober earnest by another American gentleman, who has actually succeeded in making a music publisher's catalogue entertaining. This triumph of humour is effected by giving a picturesque description of every single item in the list—sacred, secular, and dance music alike. How the worthy man's command of language could last out is a marvel, but he finishes up even more brightly than he begins, and his remarks are fraught with gems of expression such as none but the American writer can light upon. English reviewers in search of something new to say about ordinary anthems and part-songs would do well to learn variety of utterance from this brilliant creature—though heaven forbid that they should deliberately imitate him! Dr. Mackenzie would perhaps not like to have his "Bethlehem" noticed in the style of language our author adopts over an anthem bearing the same title:—

A soprano and alto duet coming in after a brief prelude is always very beautiful. This is one that will make even plain voices sound lovely. The chorus gives each voice a splendid leading, so that it does its best and fetches up at the end "in the city of gold." What more?

Of another he says:

The congregation would like to sing this anthem if they could. It is their sentiments, both words and music. Seeing they can't sing, they will love the singers who can and will sing it. It has full, rich chords, good contrasts of loud and soft, and is in every way beautiful. The closing passage is a shouter.

Of another:

Good variety. A polite bass beginning and a sweet tenor coming in, then a pure soprano and a nice alto coming in. These are lovely.

Or, again:

"What fine music!" they said the Sunday the choir sang this anthem. It is a strong chorus of unusual variety and effect. Will awaken admiration on first hearing. Organist has a good part. Singers need to practise. Not difficult, but a little fragmentary. Good for any joyful occasion.

But it is over the more difficult, because extensive, field of dance music that our cataloguer careers with most unbridled tongue. One piece he tells us is "beautiful through the open window"; another "might be played at meal-time if provision is plenty, as it makes the table very alluring"; and yet another "good for church voluntary if played without the preacher's knowing the title." But perhaps his greatest triumph is achieved over a Waltz with the odd title of "Thus and So":—

This beautiful Waltz is in every respect thus and so. To an audience made up thus and so (as most audiences are) the effect of this piece when played thus and so is most extremely thus and so. The fingers must be trained thus and so, in order to bring out the expression thus and so, but practice thus and so will accomplish it, and is of the very best kind. Good for all occasions when music, thus and so, is wanted.

We unfeignedly wish that this gentleman could be engaged to brighten up the pages of the London Post Office Directory or Bradshaw's Railway Guide. These would be fields more worthy of his great talents.

Herr Siegfried Wagner's appearance at Berlin, where he recently conducted a number of his father's compositions at a Concert of the Berlin-Potsdam Wagnerverein, has elicited a remark from a French contemporary which will find a responsive echo in many hearts. "Let us hope," says the writer, "that he will bear the burden of his illustrious name more lightly than the son of Mozart, whose gifts as a musician would have been far more generally appreciated if the shade of the composer of 'Don Giovanni' had not always been hovering over him." Herr Siegfried Wagner's dëbuts at Leipzig and Berlin are interesting in that they bring up the whole question of hereditary talent in music. Without venturing to dogmatise on this thorny topic, we think it will be conceded that in music, as elsewhere, there is not a single instance of pre-eminent genius manifesting itself in two successive generations. The case of Bach and his sons comes nearest to the exception that proves the rule, but the other really great composers either left no children—like Beethoven, Handel, Schubert, and Chopin—or else their sons and daughters never attained to more than mediocrity. In some instances, perhaps the most fortunate for the children, the latter have embraced some entirely different calling. It is much the same with the really great virtuosi and singers. Amongst vocalists many instances will be readily recalled of sons and daughters following in the footsteps of their parents, but even here it is difficult to point to a case where it has not been longo intervallo, unless we make an exception in favour of the old Garcia, father of Malibran and Pauline Viardot-Garcia. In the case of orchestral players excellence is often maintained from generation to generation. In short, genius rarely if ever repeats itself; talent, on the other hand, frequently passes in an almost equal measure from father to son and son to grandson.

The announcement that Mr. W. T. Best has been compelled to resign his position as Organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, owing to continued ill-health, will be received with universal regret. For over fifty years Mr. Best has held appointments as organist in Liverpool; he was also for some time organist at the Panopticon in Leicester Square, and subsequently at the Royal Albert Hall. Mr. Best is admittedly one of the finest executants this country has known, and he brought pedal playing to a perfection not hitherto attained. It may not be so well known that Mr. Best is also an accomplished pianist, and possesses the rare faculty of "drawing" the tones from the pianoforte. Those who have been fortunate enough to hear him on this instrument in private have realised that Mr. Best disproves the adage that "a good organist cannot be a good pianist." Since 1880 Mr. Best has been the recipient of a pension of £100 from the Civil List, conferred on him in recognition of his services to musical art. Mr. Best is not widely known as a composer, but his organ arrangements have met with universal acceptance.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

So Hans von Bülow has entered into rest, and those with whom he was in the habit of associating are, perhaps, assuring themselves of a quieter time henceforth. He was a strange character, not quite to be understood, perhaps, without reference to the abnormal conditions which developed themselves late in life. I had extremely little personal intercourse with him during his English engagements, for the reason, no doubt, that it became my duty to criticise certain features in his pianoforte playing with considerable sharpness, and Bülow was not the man to be cordial under such conditions. Of his sensitiveness and his command of epistolary vituperation I once had striking proof. Taking offence at a remark in a journal then under my editorship, Bülow addressed to me a letter which I preserved for years as a masterpiece of objurgation—nay, of verbal ferocity. I made no reply, knowing that a man at boiling point should not have the fire stirred under him, and when I met the Doctor some time later he appeared to have forgotten all about it.

Curiously enough, Bülow was not unconcerned with the events which led to the receipt by me of another letter, also profusely abusive. Such things must come to critical men who are not afraid to speak out, and sometimes one of them is worth keeping as a monumental specimen. Let me add that, in this particular instance, I deserved rebuke, because there was no occasion, when writing about Bülow as a musician, to call him an "irregular connection of Wagner." But you know as well as I do, most excellent reader, that in a foolish world one cannot be always wise. I was promptly punished. An anonymous lady sat down to her desk and poured over several sheets of paper a virulent acidity of language not often equalled :

> With fiery eyes, and with contracted brows,
> She coined her face in the severest stamp,
> And fury shook her fabric like an earthquake.

I trust the good woman felt better after the relief of discharging what Shenstone calls "fiery spirits which cause a preternatural fermentation." But I was wrong, undoubtedly—at any rate, so it seems to the more philosophic judgment which comes with years.

My good friend and fellow-labourer, Philip Hale, of Boston—to whom cordial salutations—has taken note of some remarks made in this column upon his objections to the First Symphony of Brahms, and, also, of what he calls my own "affectionate" words anent the "Bohemian Girl." Well, one is generally tender in speaking of long familiar friends, however much they may be in rear of the age, and I confess to a sentiment when the "Old Gyurl" is concerned. Mr. Hale goes on to point a moral, drawing for that purpose upon his bibliographical lore. The Rev. Martin Madan having written a "Treatise on Female Ruin"—in effect, an argument for polygamy—Sir Richard Hill answered him in another pamphlet, the introduction to which contained the following remarks: "I am sensible it will afford a singular pleasure to many that we have thus entered the lists together. But let such unhappy persons enjoy such pleasure. It is of no better sort than that which the malice of Satan excites; or, rather, it is that which excites Satan himself when he can cause Judah to vex Ephraim or Ephraim Judah. But it is a melancholy consideration that what will afford malicious glee to the children of the wicked one will prove the cause of heartfelt grief to the children of light." I take the hint, good friend. We will not entertain the children of the wicked one with a sparring match, but join forces and put them to rout.

With reference to a remark of mine that the cases are very exceptional in which musicians have died out of their beds—its application, as the context showed, was limited to famous masters—a correspondent, Mr. Herbert W. L. Rumsey, forwards a number of instances to prove that, as regards the profession generally, the exceptions are by no means few. Mr. Rumsey goes as far back as Taillefer, but I will take up his record with Claude Goudimel, killed in the Bartholomew massacre. After him, my correspondent mentions Alessandro Stradella (to whom I also referred), assassinated in 1681; Lully, who died of an abscess caused by an accidental blow from his own bâton; Michael Wise, who received mortal injuries in a Salisbury street row; Henry Carey, who committed suicide in 1743; Thomas Linley (Junior), drowned at Grimsthorpe in 1778; John Wyne, committed suicide in the same year; Robert Cooke, of Westminster Abbey, drowned in the Thames, 1814; Sebastiano Raldi, killed by the explosion of a cooking vessel, 1820; and Charles Leuner, who committed suicide at Philadelphia, 1857.

Continuing Mr. Rumsey's list, I find the names and fate of Isaac Nathan, a song composer, run over at Sydney, 1864; Philip P. Bliss, killed in an American railway accident, 1876; Virginia Gabriel, thrown from her carriage and killed, 1877; Goring Thomas, run over by a train, 1892; Anton Dubrucq, run over at Hastings, 1893; Friedrich Lissmann, found dead in a Hamburgh street; and Julius Handrock, suddenly called away while proposing a toast at his own silver wedding. I am indebted to Mr. Rumsey for the trouble he has taken in drawing up this record. By the way, there is some doubt as to the suicide of Carey.

Friendly readers have sent me, for the present number, quite a large assortment of curious concert notices. I can deal only with a few of them. In one I read that "a cornet solo, 'The Better Land,' was capitally played by F. H. Cowen." I know Mr. Cowen as the composer of a song so-called, but it is new to find him playing the melody on a cornet.

In a Staffordshire paper I read, concerning Madame Patey, that the "rich resonance of her lower notes still remains good," while of Mrs. Trust it is stated that she "established herself a thorough favourite and her return visit at any future time will be heartily welcomed." This writer has his own idea about the meaning of "return visit." A Bury St. Edmunds journal points out appreciatively that, in the performance of a certain orchestral piece, "the tuneful rattle of the mill, produced by some aptly worked source, was distinctly perceptible amidst the music of the instruments." The audience rose to the mill, if not to the music, and "could not be silenced" until a repetition began. This critic praises the orchestra because, in playing the "Express Train" galop, the puffing of the engine was finely executed. A violinist was "rewarded with a vociferous encore, and in reply bowed; but that was not enough for the audience and he had to again perform." Alas, poor mother tongue! Of a lady it is said that "she has often sung in London, and she cannot but be gratified at her cordial reception in Bury." I should think not indeed.

In the course of a "puff preliminary," a provincial paper mentions that Mr. So-and-So will sing "The Village Blacksmith" and "The Little Grey Fat Man," adding, "his rendition of these items will probably justify his recent appointment as basso in one of our leading churches." Delightful! especially "rendition of items." Here is another gem from the provincial jewel-box: "She sang most artistically, with a rich sweetness in her upper notes that more than counteracted the suspicion of floridness in the quality of her voice."

Apropos to the mangling of our English language in notices of concerts, I have a letter from the Rev. W. E. Stebbing, of Morpeth, who, like most men of taste, feels it very keenly. Mr. Stebbing writes: "But is it not time also to protest against the ridiculous words now made to do duty in musical reports—e.g., rendition, recitalist, and the like? I don't know whether, in their journalistic days, Schumann or Berlioz ever so disgraced their respective tongues as to coin or pass anything like the new nouns and verbs that are creeping into the English language 'as she is wrote' by musical journalists. Mr. Francis Espinasse has lately informed us that journalism is the grave of literary ambition. When I see these attempts to renovate our English speech I hardly agree with him. It seems to me that, after its kind, a journalist's literary success is, like Solomon's temple, 'exceeding magnifical.' I heard the art of organ-playing described the other day as 'organism,' and was horrified to see in print—actually in print—the word 'pianism!'"

The foregoing is not the entire plaint of the reverend writer, who continues: "Perhaps I should not allow all the blame to fall on musical journalists; but at a local Concert here in Northumberland an enthusiastic young scribe reported that a gentleman 'chairmanized the proceedings'; and that is a sample of the stuff served up daily in the name of English journalism. For some reason or other music is the chief topic on which these criminal attempts to mar our English tongue are fastened. That it offers wide scope to the rolling, meaningless froth of incompetent literary donkeys is painfully evident. It is the one topic which seems to turn an otherwise level-headed young man into a would-be poet."

There is only too much truth in the allegations of my correspondent; but I should like to point out, not in excuse of criminal assaults upon our language, but in palliation of sometimes uncouth word-coinage, that English terminology is curiously deficient with regard to music. How many synonyms have we for "performance"? "Rendering" is one, and "reading" is, under certain conditions, just allowable as another, while "execution" stands for a third, and "delivery" for a fourth. The poor musical critic, having to notice, perhaps, the doings of half-a-dozen soloists, to say nothing of choir and orchestra, in the course of a brief report, soon uses these up, and then is tempted, by way of avoiding repetitions, to questionable expedients. Hence, no doubt, the genesis of the hideous "rendition," use of which should disqualify a reporter for further service. I question whether, after all, these monstrous words are made in England. They are mostly an American product.

A correspondent sends me a Cardiff journal in which "Fra Diavolo" is once and again ascribed to Donizetti. I have the best reason for knowing that a critic may, in this manner, sin against his own knowledge as the result of some passing obfuscation. Many years ago, I wrote what I thought to be a careful notice of an operatic performance, and, on reading the "copy," was horrified to find the work under review spoken of as due to a composer who had no hand in it whatever, and would not have touched it with a pair of tongs. This must have been "unconscious cerebration," with a malignant imp in temporary control of the cerebrum.

I see, in American musical journals, that Rossini's "Barber of Seville" is to be performed in New York with all the characters represented by ladies; Madame Calvé, for example, taking the part of Figaro. Let us hope this report is not true, because, if true, it is disgraceful. I read, further, that the suggestion came from Mr. Mancinelli. When I am compelled to believe a story so injurious to the conductor's fair fame, I shall add that Mr. Mancinelli ought to know better, and probably go on to something more emphatic.

The recent death of Sax, the musical instrument maker, has reminded a writer in the St. James's Gazette of an adventure which placed not only that gentleman, but Brandus, the publisher, and J. W. Davison, musical critic of the Times, in very grave peril. Sax and Davison were breakfasting with Brandus on the morning of the coup d'état, the street at that hour being filled with troops, when, as alleged, a shot was fired at the soldiery from one of the windows of the house. Very promptly, indeed, Piou-Piou forced his way into the premises, arrested the innocent breakfast party, and haled them before the officer commanding in the street. "Shoot them," said the officer, and shot they would have been in a few moments; but, luckily, a General rode up and recognised Sax, with whom he had had some personal relations. By his orders, the three prisoners were confined in an adjacent passage where was a gate at either end. There they remained till, the trouble being over, they were set free. I have heard Davison tell this story more than once, but it was hardly a favourite with him.

Our Teutonic cousins are sometimes spoken of as good linguists, but there is at least one German with peculiar notions of English. The following circular issued by him was received in London recently:—"Honourable Sir,—presently I am permitting to offer you fiddle-sticks in artful furniture. The reputation of my office, founded 1876, will engage for solid labour. I have in store fiddle-sticks in every piece of wood. I am making already in pure silver furniture for 16 sh.—Prices neat cash with 5% discount.—In hope, that this profitable offer you gives conveniency to orders, signs," &c., &c. "Fiddle-sticks in artful furniture" is a masterpiece of the verbal grotesque.

The Times calls the music of the Saviour in Gounod's "Redemption," "curiously inappropriate." I should myself style this a curiously inappropriate remark.

Extract from "words for music":

My spirit left behind awhile
Its heritage of sorrow;
The world remembered not her guile,
To-day forgot to-morrow.

The writer's meaning in the last line is not difficult to guess, but the idea of forgetting that which has never had an existence is somewhat odd.

The rulers of Hants County Asylum have a frugal mind. They want an organist, a band-master, a pianist, an assistant-dispenser, and a deputy-head attendant. These five single gentlemen they expect to find rolled into one, and accordingly advertise for him, offering £45 a year, with board and lodging!

As there appears to be some doubt whether Mr. Santley ever played the part of Mephistopheles in Gounod's "Faust," it may be well to state that he did so at Her Majesty's Theatre, nearly thirty years ago, with Madame Sherrington as Margaret, Mr. C. Lyall as Valentine, Madame Florence Lancia as Siebel, and Mr. Sims Reeves as Faust.

The North Staffordshire Musical Festival is congratulated upon showing a balance sheet with £40 to the good. The sum is not large, but it will serve to encourage guarantors and others who, after the meeting of 1890, were inclined to faint-heartedness. It proves, moreover, that the Committee are on the right tack. More power to them.

Bournemouth has engaged Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., as municipal music-master, and will spend about £5,000 on a band, &c., during the present year. The seed is good and plentiful, the harvest should be abundant.

HANS VON BÜLOW.

The death of Hans von Bülow, though in some respects a merciful release, in view of the physical and mental ailments which had clouded his last few years, has nevertheless come with a painful shock to his many admirers. He was not a young man, having completed his sixty-fourth year, but with a more evenly-balanced temperament might have looked forward to many years of activity. Dis aliter visum. As a last resource he set out, with his wife, at the end of January, in the hope that the African climate, if it did not restore him to health, might at least bring that alleviation which his doctors had been unable to afford. But he can only have been but a few days n Egypt before the end came. It was at Cairo that he passed away, and by a strange coincidence it was on February 13, the same day on which, eleven years earlier, Richard Wagner, the man who, both as an artist and a man, had exerted the most powerful influence upon him, had gone over to the great majority.

Hans Guido von Bülow, who was born at Dresden, on January 8, 1830, came of a noble family and inherited his literary ability from his father, a writer of considerable talent. He was not exactly a prodigy—that is to say, he did not display the precocious passion for music which has been observed in some great musicians almost from infancy; but the talent was there, and, curious to say, it was an attack of scarlet fever that brought it out. Accordingly at the age of nine, though his parents had no intention of destining him to the profession, he was placed under Friedrich Wieck—the father of Madame Schumann—for instruction in the pianoforte, and under Herr Eberwein for theory. According to Mr. Dannreuther's article in Grove's Dictionary, and to the article which has just appeared in the Allgemeine Musikzeitung, Von Bülow went to Leipzig in 1848 to study jurisprudence at the University there, and at that date became the pupil of Moritz Hauptmann. But on consulting the list of Hauptmann's pupils with the years attached which Mr. Coleridge reprints in his English edition of Hauptmann's letters, the name of Hans von Bülow will be found opposite the year 1845. Amongst his contemporaries at Dresden may be mentioned Dr. Joachim, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and Mr. W. S. Rockstro. Von Bülow did not escape the wave of political excitement which was sweeping over Europe at this stormy epoch, and in 1849 we find him in the thick of the movement at Berlin, on intimate terms with Ferdinand Lassalle, Lothar Bucher, Bauer, and other advanced thinkers, and contributing frequently to the columns of a democratic journal called the Abendpost. Wagner's "Art and Revolution" had already appeared, its teachings found in Von Bülow a fervent sympathiser, and several of his articles in the Abendpost were devoted to the promulgation and defence of the musical doctrines of the new German school founded by Wagner and Liszt. It is said by some authorities that he made his first appearance as a pianist while at school at Stuttgart, but his final resolve to adopt the musical profession was not taken until 1850, when a performance of "Lohengrin," under Liszt's direction, at Weimar, moved him to emulate Schumann's example and desert jurisprudence for music. Wagner was then an exile at Zürich, and to him Von Bülow repaired with a view to obtaining advice as to his course of study. Wagner initiated him in the art of directing an orchestra, and after Von Bülow had appeared in this capacity at Zürich and St. Gall, he returned to Germany in 1851, and became a pupil of Liszt's at Weimar, along with Klindworth, Raff, Dräseke, and Bronsart, and in a very short time developed into one of the finest pianists of the century, adding to a splendid technique a profoundly intellectual and lucid style and a prodigious memory, of which more anon. Old Hauptmann says of him: "Certainly Hans von Bülow plays everything," implying that not only was his repertory immense, but that there was no difficulty which he could not surmount. His first Concert tour was in 1853, when he played at Vienna, Pesth, Dresden, Carlsruhe, Bremen, and finally at Berlin. Shortly afterwards he accepted the post of principal professor of the pianoforte at the newly-founded Stern Conservatorium, and was married, in 1857, to Cosima, the younger daughter of Liszt; the elder, Blandine, married M. Emile Ollivier, the French statesman, and died young. About this date the title of Court Pianist was conferred upon him, the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy having been bestowed on him by the University of Jena in 1853. The years that Von Bülow now spent in Berlin were amongst the busiest of his life. His many-sided activity found vent in teaching, writing in both musical and political journals, giving pianoforte recitals, and organising and taking part in concerts of chamber and, above all, of orchestral music, where he laid the foundations of that wonderful mastery of the orchestra in which, according to some of the very best judges, he was never surpassed. Armed with a handful of anecdotes, ignorant scribes have been rushing into print, almost before Von Bülow was cold in his grave, with the assertion that he was a mere pianist and nothing else. For sheer ineptitude the article in the National Observer, of the 17th ult., must be awarded the palm.

"Bülow," remarks the writer, "can never be described as a great musician; his compositions are of doubtful value, and even the value of his execution as a pianist has been widely disputed. . . . He may be described, briefly, as the most devoted servant of a revolutionary cause that music ever knew." From beginning to end of this astounding article, not a word is said of Von Bülow's transcendent skill as a conductor, and most probably for the excellent reason that the writer had never heard of it, or of the Meiningen Orchestra, or of the famous performances of "Tristan" and the "Meistersinger," or of the fact that Hans Richter (whom even the National Observer critic may have heard of) learnt his business under Von Bülow. And as for his being a devoted servant of a revolutionary cause, let it suffice to inform the National Observer that Von Bülow's artistic belief was summed up in his own famous Credo: "I believe in Bach, the Father, Beethoven, the Son, and Brahms, the Holy Ghost"; that his editions of the pianoforte works of Beethoven, and of many of the compositions of Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn are monuments of erudition, and have unquestionably contributed materially to maintain the prestige of these masters; that "Carmen" was one of his favourite operas; and that his devotion to Wagner was compatible with the suggestion that a waltz by Strauss would occasionally afford most welcome relief at a Symphonic Concert.

Apologising to our readers for this digression, let us return to the record of Von Bülow's life. After nine years' residence at Berlin, where, in addition to the classical masterpieces, he introduced a great many representative orchestral compositions of Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz, Raff, Volkmann, and other modern writers, he removed to Munich, where, owing to the good services of Wagner, he was appointed principal Conductor of the Court Theatre of Ludwig II. of Bavaria and director of the Conservatorium. Here he threw himself with characteristic energy into the congenial task of producing the operas of his friend, and was in particular responsible for model performances of "Tristan und Isolde" and the "Meistersinger." In 1869 his marriage was dissolved, his wife subsequently marrying Wagner. We may here mention, parenthetically, that he never afterwards visited Bayreuth in the lifetime of Wagner. Von Bülow felt the blow deeply, though the painful circumstances of the case never impaired his admiration for the works of Wagner, and expatriated himself for several years, making Florence his headquarters for a time. During this period, so he told Dr. Otto Lessmann, he felt as if he were dead to Germany, though he exerted himself diligently to secure a hearing for the music of his compatriots in other countries. But his restless spirit would never allow him to remain long in one place, and for several years he led the life of the travelling virtuoso, touring in Italy, Germany, Poland, England, and America, visiting the last-named continent with great success in 1875-6. After holding the post of Court Conductor at Hanover for a short while, he accepted the invitation of the Duke of Meiningen to become his Hofmusikintendant, and in his five years' tenure of that office raised the Meiningen Orchestra to a pitch of unparalleled excellence. At the head of this famous orchestra he visited many of the principal cities of Germany, devoting his energies with brilliant results to the popularisation of the works of Brahms, and waging a relentless warfare against pedantry and prejudice. After the severance of his connection with Meiningen, in October, 1885, he directed various sets of Concerts in St. Petersburg and Frankfort, where he also taught in the Raff Conservatorium. He visited England several times in the last twenty years, conducting a Musical Festival in Glasgow, 1878, his last appearance in our midst being in 1888, when he gave a Beethoven Recital in St. James's Hall and was the guest of Professor Stanford at Cambridge. Here we may mention that he had a cordial admiration for the genius of the Irish composer, whose "Irish" Symphony he introduced with great success at Hamburg and Berlin. He had also a very high opinion of the compositions of Dr. Mackenzie, whose works he performed in Glasgow and on the Continent. In 1888 he took up his residence at Hamburg, from which city he started on his last journey just a month ago. For the last few years of his life he was very much in evidence at Berlin as Director of the Philharmonic Concerts, and in spite of his eccentricities and ebullitions of temper—largely the result of ill-health—his efforts and achievements as a conductor will, as Dr. Lessmann puts it, remain imperishably inscribed in letters of gold in the musical annals of that city. "Von Bülow," to quote from the admirable notice of that genial yet acute critic, "was one of the truest and most earnest artists that ever lived. He detested nothing more cordially than superficiality and efforts after mere ad captandum effect. Without remorse or pity he would pour his biting sarcasm on all empty pretence, and discharge the shafts of his trenchant wit at arrogant mediocrity. But, on the other hand, sincere and genuine endeavour always found in him the most impartial champion."

Given this passionate contempt for shams, charlatans, and scamped work, given also a genius for satire, an excessively sensitive organization, and, at the same time, a fearless disregard for opinion, it need excite no surprise that some persons should have endeavoured to write him down as a good pianist with a bad temper. It is true that he often missed golden opportunities for holding his tongue, especially in the last two or three years of his life, when his nerves often got the better of his judgment. But it should never be forgotten that not many months ago, on the occasion of his re-appearance as Conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts at Berlin, after a severe illness, he besought his audience to grant him an amnesty for his past extravagancies, and that the public whom he had so often scarified granted the request with enthusiasm. There can be no doubt, again, that he was, to a considerable extent, the victim of his reputation as a wit, obscure jesters gaining currency for their rude or vulgar jokes by ascribing them to Von Bülow. Of the authentic anecdotes, none, perhaps, exhibits his peculiar vein of raillery more happily than his rebuke of the chattering chorus girls: "Ladies, remember you are not called upon to save Rome." During the interval of one of his Concerts at Vienna a friend came to see him in the artists' room, and found, to his surprise, that the place of honour on the walls was occupied by a portrait of Mdlle. ——, the prima ballerina at the Imperial Opera House. "I didn't know," he remarked to Von Bülow, "that you were such an admirer of the ballet." "Oh, yes," replied Von Bülow, "I have the greatest respect for Mdlle. ——. She is the only artist at the Opera who is never out of tune." Even more malicious was his method of testifying his contempt for a venerable but not venerated musician for whom a testimonial was being raised. On being asked for a subscription, Von Bülow said yes, on condition that his name might appear at the head of the list, which was on view at a leading musicseller's shop. The authorities acceded to his request with effusion, whereon Von Bülow immediately put down his name for sixpence. Unlike some humorists, Von Bülow had a keen appreciation for the wit of others. Once he asked a Viennese friend what the latter thought of a new pianist, and when his friend replied, "Oh, he plays all the easiest passages with the utmost difficulty," Von Bülow laughed heartily, adding "That's the sort of joke that I like making." The story of the seventy pieces of india-rubber is well known, and a writer in the Speaker of the 17th ult. recalls the delightful anecdote of his protest against the réclame of the American pianoforte manufacturer, whose board he unhooked from the grand pianoforte in full view of the audience, flung it on the platform, and danced a war dance on it. Even when his humour was most outrageous it was nine times out of ten on the side of the angels.

As an executant he was chiefly notable, in the happy phrase of Mr. Dannreuther, for the "passionate intellectuality" of his style, a peculiar feature of which was that under his fingers the most difficult passages invariably sounded easy. In this place we may conveniently transcribe the estimate of his abilities written several years ago by a German critic: "As a pianist, in spite of the smallness of his hands, he has mastered all imaginable technical difficulties; he is a most admirable interpreter of the different styles and various tendencies of the literature of the instrument, which he reproduces with a clearness of analysis, a delicacy of detail, and, at the same time, a breadth and a poetry of conception which place him in the foremost rank.

Furthermore, he identifies himself so thoroughly with the works which he performs as to know them by heart, no matter how long or complex they may be. And so also is it with the most elaborate orchestral compositions, which he conducts without score, with an imperturbable confidence and a rigid observance of the minutest indications of the composer." Von Bülow was, in the opinion of many good judges, the first conductor, without exception, of his time, his versatile talents being displayed with equally brilliant results on the concert platform or in the theatre. His absolute supremacy as a conductor may be called in question, but, at any rate, there can be no controversy as to his unequalled memory. It is said that while at Meiningen he was not content with conducting and rehearsing works without a score, but even endeavoured to get his orchestra to learn their parts by heart. More than once he has been known to study pieces in the train and then play them for the first time by heart.

Space fails us or we would have dwelt on his keen interest in literature and philosophy, his skill as a writer and a controversialist, and his generosity to pupils and aspirants. In spite of his birth and connection with so many courts, the title which he liked best was that which he conferred upon himself: "Hof-Kapellmeister of His Majesty the German People." But as we have seen, this attitude toward his country was compatible with the most catholic appreciation of the works of foreigners. He fell foul of Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem when it was first produced, but quite recently acknowledged the injustice of his criticism, and addressed his recantation to Verdi himself. His services to Russian art drew forth a generous eulogium from the late M. Tschaikowsky, when occasion was taken of the visit of M. Lamoureux to draw invidious comparisons between the French and the German conductor. Of his admiration for the works of French and English composers we have already spoken. He was, in short, in spite of all his imperfections, a great artist and a great man whose memory will long be kept green in the hearts of all true votaries of the art he served so faithfully and so well.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Lent was, as usual, ushered in at the Albert Hall by a performance of Gounod's sacred trilogy "The Redemption," a work of course peculiarly suitable for the penitential season. "The Messiah" used to be given on this occasion, but Handel's sacred masterpiece is now reserved for New Year's Day and Good Friday. The performance of "The Redemption" was quite up to the average in merit, and perhaps, as regards the choir, rather above it. Sir Joseph Barnby's perfectly trained choristers seemed to revel in the French master's chromatic progressions, and not even in that crux as regards pure intonation, "The Reproaches," was there any perceptible descent in pitch. Changes had to be made at the last moment in respect of the principal vocalists. Miss Esther Palliser and Miss Margaret Hoare were both unable to appear, but the ever-ready Miss Anna Williams sang the principal soprano music with her usual artistic conscientiousness, and Miss Hoare found an agreeable substitute in that promising young singer Miss Jessie Hudleston. The part of the Redeemer was sung with great pathos by Mr. Watkin Mills; Miss Marie Brema was admirable in the contralto music, and the two Narrators had eloquent representatives in Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Norman Salmond. "The Redemption" has seldom been heard under more favourable conditions.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To dedicate one of these Concerts to the memory of Wagner has for long been part of Mr. Henschel's annual scheme, and it has again and again been made clear that the public to whose support Mr. Henschel looks—and does not look in vain—regards the In Memoriam Concert, which takes place as near as possible to the date of the Bayreuth master's death, as the most interesting of the whole series. The Concert of the 8th ult. was no exception to this at present unbroken rule, for the audience which then filled St. James's Hall was more numerous and more enthusiastic than ever. There are still some, it is believed, who look with comparative intolerance on these exhibitions of enthusiasm; but for the moment we are less concerned to defend than to define the public attitude. On the occasion now in question the audience might have pointed for its justification—had any been necessary—to the intrinsic excellence of the manner of the performance, considered apart from the matter. Mr. Henschel was in his happiest mood. The martinet in him has almost disappeared; the lyric mood, which at one time visited him all too seldom, is now his most constant guest, and in point of general sympathy he is scarcely to be recognised as the uncompromising conductor of six or seven years ago. This stated with all possible emphasis, there is little need to recall the details of a Concert which maintained a singularly even level of interpretative value. The Prelude and Good Friday Spell Music from "Parsifal," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan," and the still more familiar "Walküren ritt" were all played with uniform excellence, the Liebestod, indeed, being so admirably played as to move the audience to something like excitement. In the middle of the programme came the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, the noble work which is now de rigueur on these occasions; its interpretation was remarkably dignified and poetic. It will be seen that the scheme of the Concert included no solos, either vocal or instrumental, which makes its success a still more comfortable prophecy for the future of public taste.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Mr. Manns, who was very cordially received on resuming the bâton at the eleventh Concert of the Saturday series on the 17th ult., introduced a new Symphonic Fantasy from the pen of Mr. Burmeister, a German professor resident in Baltimore. The new work, which is entitled "The Chase after Fortune," was suggested by Henneberg's picture, which allegorically represents the struggle for success in modern life. It is divided into three movements, all of which are based upon a series of short motives which, with the exception of two themes in the Finale, are common to each; and it may at once be stated that the Fantasy relies for its effect far more upon ingenuity of construction and treatment than for intrinsic beauty of idea. In other words, poverty of inspiration is veiled under an elaborate display of science and a prodigal employment of all the resources of modern orchestration. Mr. Manns secured a good performance of the new work, which was, however, coldly received. Lady Hallé was heard to great advantage in Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the orchestral accompaniment being very finely played, and in Dr. Mackenzie's poetic and attractive "Highland Ballad." The vocalist was Miss Evangeline Florence, who sang with great taste and fluency the waltz from "Mireille" and Schubert's "Der Hirt auf dem Felsen," one of the most diffuse specimens of the genius of the great Viennese master. Inasmuch as it was written to show off a voice of exceptionally robust calibre, Miss Florence's choice cannot be pronounced very happy, her slender organ being occasionally overpowered by the full tones of the clarinet obbligato, finely played by Mr. Clinton. The Overtures to "Paradise and the Peri" (Sterndale Bennett) and "Oberon" completed the programme.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Of the majority of the entertainments over which our present survey extends there is little to be said. For example, on Saturday, January 27—which is the first Concert of which record has now to be made—the concerted works were Brahms's Second Sextet in G (Op. 36) and Mendelssohn's movements from an unfinished Quartet. Mr. Leonard Borwick, in Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 81) and "Les Adieux," and Mr. Piatti, in Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," were, as usual, admirable; Miss Kate Cove sang in pleasant fashion Handel's air "Lusinghe più care" and Mr. Henschel's "Spinning Wheel" song. Miss Cove has a well-trained soprano voice, not very powerful, but of agreeable quality.

On Monday, January 29, Lady Hallé introduced for the first time at these Concerts Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's picturesque and expressive "Highland Ballad" for violin, which was first performed by Mr. Hans Wessely at a Concert of the Westminster Orchestral Society in May last year. It was then generally recognised as a worthy companion to the Scottish composer's "Pibroch," and on the present occasion it was played with exquisite feeling by the Moravian violinist, and very warmly received, Dr. Mackenzie appearing to share in the applause. Another performance of uncommon excellence was that of the whole of Schumann's Fantasiestücke (Op. 12) by Mr. Leonard Borwick. These piquant sketches could not be more eloquently interpreted, and Mr. Borwick again proved himself one of the best exponents of Schumann's music now available. Brahms's Quintet in G (Op. 111), one of the German composer's ripest and most characteristic chamber works, opened the Concert, and Beethoven's early and tuneful Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin (Op. 12, No. 2) brought it to a conclusion. One more item remains to be mentioned; this was a series of three Shakespearian Sonnets (Nos. 18, 29, and 99), set to music for baritone voice by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. These are not only musicianly but poetically conceived lyrics, and so far removed from ordinary ballads that their merit could not be accurately gauged on a first hearing. They were sung with all needful expression by Mr. Arthur Oswald.

On the following Saturday Lady Hallé made her last appearance this season, and Brahms's Quintet in G was repeated, Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 3) being the only other concerted piece in the programme. Mr. Leonard Borwick gave an extremely thoughtful and intelligent rendering of Schubert's lengthy but very beautiful Sonata in B flat, and Miss Florence Christie made a favourable impression in songs by Giordani and Massenet. Interest, however, may be said to have centred in the four new Irish pieces for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, by Professor Villiers Stanford, which were exquisitely rendered by Lady Hallé. Their titles, "A Lament," "Jig," "Hush Song," and "Reel," sufficiently indicate the character of each piece; and it may be added that while the accomplished composer has not neglected the characteristics of Irish music, he has been careful to make his efforts worthy of consideration from the standpoint of a high-class musician. The Irish pieces were received with much warmth, and should be presented again at one of the Popular Concerts when opportunity offers.

There was not a very large attendance on the 5th ult., when Dr. Joachim made his first appearance this season, for the weather was repellent; but the highly esteemed Hungarian violinist had an enthusiastic welcome, and speedily justified it by his magnificent playing in Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1), Haydn's Quartet in B flat (Op 64, No. 5), and the Adagio from Spohr's Concerto in E minor (No. 7). In all of these Dr. Joachim displayed the same magnificent tone, vigorous bowing, and unsurpassable artistic feeling as of yore. Miss Fanny Davies was eminently successful in two of Beethoven's minor pieces, and the same remark will apply to Madame Bertha Moore as the vocalist.

On Saturday, the 10th ult., Miss Eibenschütz repeated her selection from Brahms's new pieces, and added the Intermezzo in E flat minor from Op. 118. This sketch is characterised by tragic expressiveness, and among Brahms's smaller efforts is not surpassed. The whole of the pieces were again beautifully played, and in response to a determined encore Miss Eibenschütz repeated the delightful Intermezzo in C, which will assuredly become popular, as it is but moderately difficult. Dr. Joachim played in superb fashion Schumann's elaborate Fantasia in A minor (Op. 131), which was written expressly for him in 1853, and the concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74) and the same master's early Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3). Miss Alice Esty, an agreeable light soprano, gave a fair amount of satisfaction as the vocalist.

The Concert of Monday, 12th ult., may be briefly dismissed. The concerted works were Mendelssohn's Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1) and Mozart's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin. Mr. Leonard Borwick repeated his artistic performance of Schumann's Fantasiestücke (Op. 12) and Dr. Joachim gave his splendid interpretation of Bach's Chaconne. Great praise is also due to Mr. David Bispham, who rendered vocal pieces by Marcello and Loewe with more than ordinary intelligence.

Heavy rain notwithstanding, there was scarcely a vacant seat on Saturday, the 17th ult., although there was nothing in the programme to call for more than passing mention. Mozart's ninth and last Quintet for strings in E flat, Dvorák's picturesque and original Pianoforte Trio in F minor (Op. 65), and Brahms's vigorous and concise Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin (Op. 100) were the concerted works. The statement in the book, that until 1890 Dvorák was little more than a name in this country, "or, at best, a sign representing some unknown quantity," is a singular error, as the Bohemian master's principal works have been known and loved for considerably more than a decade, and he visited us and conducted his "Stabat Mater" at the Albert Hall as far back as March 13, 1884. Miss Fanny Davies played a Prelude and Fugue of Mendelssohn's in her best manner, and Mr. Santley, as a matter of course, gave perfect satisfaction as the vocalist.

The last Concert we can notice at present is that of Monday, 19th ult., which was one of the most interesting of the month, though the pieces marked first time were not works of magnitude. Three movements from a Suite in G for pianoforte by that composer of elegant salon music, Moszkowski (Op. 50), were played in spirited style by Miss Eibenschütz, and why the final Presto alla Giga should have been omitted it is difficult to understand, as all the movements are brief and light in texture. Other fragments were included—namely, the Abend-Glocken and Ballade from Dr. Joachim's set of three pieces for violin with pianoforte accompaniment (Op. 5). These movements are very effective, especially the first, and it is surprising they have not been heard before. Schumann's Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 3) was placed at the head of the scheme, and Brahms's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and horn (Op. 40) brought it to a conclusion. The horn part in the last-named work was played on the violoncello by Signor Piatti, with the composer's sanction; but the statement in the programme book that Brahms has produced nothing since in the way of chamber music with wind instruments is surely misleading. His Clarinet Quintet and his Clarinet Trio (Op. 114 and 115) are little more than two years old, and the former has been performed so many times that it may already be regarded almost as a classic. The vocalist at this Concert, Miss Gwladys Wood, won deserved favour in songs by Handel and Schubert, and also in a quaint and piquant ditty, "Queen and Huntress," by Mr. W. S. Rockstro.

BERLIOZ'S "FAUST."

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company's production of this work in operatic form at Liverpool, on the 3rd ult., was an event of much interest, and attracted a large number of professors and amateurs from far as well as near. Nor were the general public unaffected. Crowds awaited the opening of the doors and struggled for places in the liveliest fashion, over 1,400 persons finding room somehow in the gallery. In fact, every part of the Court Theatre filled to the last seat. This excitement, it may be supposed, arose from the popularity of the music, and a natural desire to see with the eye pictures which before had been left to the imagination. Mr. T. H. Friend, who undertook the production, had called Mr. Robson, the scenic artist, to his aid, and between them they produced stage effects as complete and satisfactory as reasonable minds could have expected. The impossible was even attempted but, of course, not achieved. By no stage art could the "Ride to the Abyss" be adequately shown, and though the manager spent money liberally on mechanical horses, &c., he was bound to fail, and did fail. On the other hand, some of the scenes were a distinct success, among them that in which Sylphs dance around the sleeping Faust—a very charming display of landscape, colours, and forms—and that which represented Margaret's dream, showing through the magically transparent walls of her chamber the doings of demons and citizens in the street without. In these cases, and others, there was much to praise and yet more to interest. It cannot be necessary to insist upon the fact that certain parts of the work gained little from the stage; but many more had their effect heightened by scenery and action. Of these, we may mention the revelry in Auerbach's Cellar, the love scene in Margaret's House, and Faust's final interview with his victim. In these dramatic interest prevailed, and the essential conditions of operatic effect were present. Altogether, the representation heightened the force of the work and was extremely well received. Several performances have since been given to crowded houses, so that there is good reason for hope of considerable profit to the Company, not only at Liverpool, but elsewhere.

Miss de Lussan played Margaret, Mr. McGuckin Faust, Mr. Alec Marsh Mephistopheles, and Mr. Pringle Brander, each artist being equal to a task upon which we need not dwell because of its perfect familiarity.

THURSDAY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.

Joachim Raff was the composer selected by Messrs. William Nicholl, Septimus Webbe, Otto Peiniger, and Hans Adolf Brousil for their third Subscription Concert of the season, given at Princes' Hall on the 1st ult. Of the five examples of the prolific musician, the most important was the Trio in G major for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 112), which was received with respectful attention, though it failed to evoke enthusiasm. For this, however, Messrs. Webbe, Peiniger, and Brousil could not be blamed, inasmuch as they ably brought out all the principal features of the work. A more thankful task awaited Mr. Webbe, the pianist, with the "Giga con variazioni," from the Suite in D minor. Miss Minnie Robinson sang the "Ave Maria" with the requisite fervour, and Mr. Nicholl once more proved a finished and thoughtful artist in "David Riccio's letztes Lied" and "Ständchen." These vocalists also distinguished themselves in the second part—the lady by the taste displayed in three songs from "A Posy of Proverbs," by Miss Beatrice Parkyns, and Mr. Nicholl by his extremely expressive delivery of Mr. Charles Macpherson's "To Mary" and "The Fisher," and of Shield's familiar air "The Thorn." For violoncello solos Mr. Brousil gave in excellent style a Romance by Svendsen and a Scherzo by Klengel, whilst Mr. Peiniger, the violinist, chose the "Rondo capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns.

MR. RICHARD GOMPERTZ'S CONCERTS.

The Concerts given by this admirable violinist at Princes' Hall, on January 30 and the 13th ult., were of such excellence that larger audiences might reasonably have been looked for. There was no lack of appreciation, however, in those who came, and who would, indeed, have shown themselves hard to please had they been indifferent to the feast of good things set before them. On the first occasion the "standard" works included such masterpieces as Schubert's Quartet in G (Op. 161) and Beethoven's posthumous Quartet in F (Op. 135). The novelties consisted of a melodious and richly-harmonised Adagio for violin and orchestra (or pianoforte), by Mr. Emanuel Moór, and two fine songs by Mr. Algernon Ashton. The former, capitally played by Mr. Gompertz and the composer, won them two recalls; and the latter being sung by Miss Fillunger naturally lost nothing by their interpretation. The popular vocalist was also heard in two songs by Brahms and had some difficulty in escaping an encore. At the second Concert, Professor Villiers Stanford's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 45) was brought to a first hearing in Central London. It is a genial, powerful, and original work, full of melody, and displaying in ample measure the ripe musicianship and command of resource which distinguish the efforts of this composer. Its complexity, however, is such that no safe judgment can be formed, after only one hearing, of the rank it should occupy among contemporary productions, or indeed even among those of its composer. As to its right to be heard again, and often, no doubt could exist in the minds of those who on this occasion first made acquaintance with its many beauties. The remaining instrumental pieces were Brahms's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Op. 78)—in which Mr. Gompertz was most worthily associated with Madame Alma Haas—and Beethoven's celebrated C sharp minor (posthumous) Quartet. Mr. Shakespeare, who was his own accompanist, sang songs by Mendelssohn and Rubinstein, and also brought forward a charming setting, by A. Somervell, of "Tears, idle tears."

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Brahms's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and waldhorn (Op. 40) opened the Students' Concert of the 1st ult., and was performed by Miss Gwendolyn Toms, Miss Ruth Howell, and Mr. Joseph Smith with evident appreciation of its romantic beauty. A special word of praise is due to the gentleman for his artistic rendering of the lovely horn part. A wild, brilliant, and noisy Fantasia, by Hiller, on Weber's famous song "Lützow's wilde Jagd," for two pianofortes, was played by two very young pupils—the sisters Rosina and Bice Cerasoli—with remarkable accuracy and vigour; and Mozart's String Quartet in G, excellently led by Miss Otie Chew (with whom Messrs. Charles Jacoby and Ernest Tomlinson and Miss Emma Smith were associated), was the remaining concerted piece. Miss Grace Hobson displayed a sympathetic voice and style in a sentimental song à la Abt, by Wilhelm Popp, and Sir Arthur Sullivan's duet "The Sisters" (O diviner Air) was expressively sung by Misses Ena Bedford and Louisa Lunn.

At the second Concert, on the 8th ult., the principal feature was an exceptionally meritorious performance, by Misses Marie Motto and Ruth Howell, of Bach's Double Concerto for two violins in D minor. Miss Jessie Grimson, Messrs. Charles Jacoby, William Ackroyd, and Paul Ludwig gave a note-perfect but unappreciative rendering of Brahms's splendid String Quartet in A minor. Misses Katharine Sims and Alice Eleison played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte and Violoncello Sonata in D (Op. 58), and Miss Dora Barrington, a light soprano, and Mr. Herbert Hilton, a sonorous bass, were heard in songs by Handel and Gounod respectively.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Under the direction of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, a Concert was given at the Imperial Institute on the 7th ult. The executants were Messrs. Emile Sauret, Oscar Beringer, and E. de Munck. Dr. Mackenzie's beautiful "Pibroch" was admirably played by Mr. Sauret, and two delightful songs from the same pen were sung by Mr. Iver McKay and accompanied by their composer. Other songs were contributed by Miss Medora Henson. The instrumentalists gave a fine performance of Rubinstein's Trio in B flat, and Messrs. Beringer and De Munck played solos. Mr. Battison Haynes was an admirable accompanist.

Several of the pupils appeared on the 21st ult., at the Imperial Institute. Amongst the most successful may be mentioned Miss Edith Hands, who gave an expressive rendering of Lassen's "As once in May"; Miss Llewela Davies, who played Chopin's familiar Polonaise in A flat (Op. 53); and Mr. Aldo Antonietti, a young violinist of remarkable promise. Other soloists who met with much favour from a large audience were Mr. Reginald Brophy and Mr. Percy Egerton. The female choir sang some interesting part-songs with admirable precision, and an orchestra of strings, under the conductorship of Mr. Emile Sauret, played with excellent effect Fuchs's charming Serenade in D. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted.

MR. DOLMETSCH'S RECITALS.

Mr. Dolmetsch began his proposed series of Recitals at his house at Dulwich on January 30, when the music performed was selected entirely from English composers of the sixteenth century. Amongst these, Henry VIII. occupied a conspicuous place. Mr. Dolmetsch, whose explanatory and eulogistic remarks considerably contribute to the interest of these meetings, evidently looks upon the matrimonial king as a very ill-used composer. But this is not to continue. His majesty's compositions are to be published, edited, explained, and illustrated respectively by Messrs. Dolmetsch, Hollis, and Burne Jones. Some little pecuniary difficulty at present bars the way—perhaps also there may arise a further "little difficulty" of deciding "the precise locality" where Henry VIII. begins and his music-master leaves off. Certainly the decided merit and advanced style of the vocal and instrumental pieces performed on this occasion will provoke the controversial instincts of antiquarians. An especially attractive performance was that given by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, who most effectively played on a fine specimen of the ancient virginal two pieces by Byrde and one by Thomas Morley, from the remarkable collection commonly known as "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book," which, in spite of the present antiquarian zeal, has never yet been printed.

At the second Concert, on the 13th ult., the programme consisted of a most interesting selection from the writings of William and Henry Lawes, who lived in the seventeenth century. The excerpts by the last-named composer included five songs from Milton's "Mask of Comus"; a curiously languishing setting of the words now so intimately associated with Hatton's song "To Anthea"; a quaint ditty, "I am confirm'd a woman can love this, or that, or any man"; and a bacchanal for two voices, suggestive of the style of Purcell. The talents of William Lawes were well shown in a Suite for four viols and harpsichord, consisting of a Pavan, Almaine and Ayre. Mr. Dolmetsch and his pupils evince considerable command over their respective bygone instruments, but the music would acquire greater charm if more variety and warmth of expression were infused into the renderings.

MR. CUMMINGS ON "ENGLISH MUSIC."

Mr. W. H. Cummings concluded his instructive remarks on "The English Schools of Musical Composition," at the Royal Institution, on the 3rd ult., the two last lectures being chiefly devoted to the English composers of madrigals and the works of Purcell and Handel. With regard to madrigals the lecturer had comparatively an easy task to show that although they were not indigenous to England, English writers speedily excelled in this form of composition. In speaking of Jacques Clement, better known to his contemporaries as "Clemens non Papa," to distinguish him from the Pope of the same name, amusing reference was made to a modern annotator, who explained that "non papa" implied "Clemens, junior, and not the father." Another story was told concerning Gibbons's madrigal "The silver swan," which appeared in a French collection of professedly ancient music as a vocal solo, entitled "The captive Crusader," the pianoforte accompaniment being supplied by the other voice parts, and that portion of the music which originally illustrated the words "More geese than swans now live, more fools than wise," being supplied by "Delivrez moi Seigneur," a proceeding that would seem to indicate the truth of the original words of Gibbons's madrigal. Interesting allusion was also made to Richard Edwardes, a law student, a MS. collection of whose madrigals, which there was evidence to show had once belonged to Henry VIII. and afterwards to Queen Elizabeth, had been purchased by Mr. Cummings for £82, and subsequently sold for the same sum to the authorities of the British Museum. Other English composers mentioned were: William Byrde, Thomas Morley, Orlando Gibbons, John Wilbye, Webbe, Walmisley, and Thomas Linley, a most interesting series of examples from whose writings were beautifully sung by pupils of the Royal Normal College.

The concluding Lecture was opened by a brief reference to viols and their ultimate replacement by the violin, concerning which the lecturer quoted the following lines written by a wit of that day:—

> A squeaking engine he applied
> Unto his neck on North-east side,
> Just where the hangman does dispose,
> To special friends, the knot of noose.

Could this wit have seen some of our present fair violinists, doubtless he would have written very differently. The lines, however, support the lecturer's suggestion that the viol was held lower down than the violin of to-day. Much interest naturally pertained to Mr. Cummings's remarks on Purcell. An emphatic denial was given to the popularly known music to Macbeth having been written by Matthew Locke. "I have in my possession," said the lecturer, "the score in Purcell's own boyish hand. Locke did write music to 'Macbeth,' but it is quite different to that which is commonly ascribed to him." The remarkable fact that Purcell should, in "Dido and Æneas," have written without a model an opera so far in advance of his age was of course dwelt upon, and interesting comparisons made between some of Purcell's harmonic progressions and those of Wagner. This led to the remark that some of Purcell's progressions were so bold that the effect on the untempered instruments of his day must have been anything but agreeable; and to the suggestion that the extra notes for G sharp and A flat, C sharp and D flat, which formerly existed in the Temple organ, had probably originated with Purcell, who was chosen to show off the capabilities of the instrument. Dr. Arne was described as one who, had his moral character been as great as his genius, might have done great things for English music, and Handel as one who had assimilated all that was best in the old English school of music, and might therefore be claimed as British in genius.

The illustrations at this Lecture, in addition to a series of vocal excerpts from "Dido and Æneas," and a rarely-heard anthem, "When the ear heard him," written by Handel for the funeral of Queen Caroline, sung by the same vocalists as at the preceding Lecture, comprised a Sonata for strings and pianoforte in B minor, from the second set by Henry Purcell, admirably played by Messrs. G. Walenn, Vionée, Parker, and Norman Cummings.

MR. GRAVES ON "OLD IRISH SONG."

"It is the largest audience we have had since Professor Dewar's lecture on liquid air," said Sir Frederick Bramwell to Mr. A. P. Graves, at the conclusion of the latter's discourse on Old Irish Song, at the Royal Institution, on January 26—a suggestive remark, and one that would seem to indicate that ancient Irish music is as attractive as it is a fertile subject upon which to speak. But be this as it may, Mr. Graves ensured the former quality by engaging Miss Liza Lehmann and Miss Marie Brema to sing an interesting series of examples, and it was evident from the lecturer's reproachful glances at the clock that he could have continued speaking for a considerable period after the sternly enforced "one hour." Mr. Graves began by giving an interesting sketch of the training, duties, and privileges of the ancient bards; how they had to master the intricacies of the most complicated laws of verse ever invented, and how they had to satisfy the moral requirements of "purity of hand bright without wounding, purity of mouth without poisonous satire, purity of learning without reproach, purity as a husband in wedlock." This high standard, however, defeated its own object, for it resulted in the creation of numerous grades of minor poets, who multiplied to such an extent and became so importunate as to ultimately cause the downfall of the entire order. One of the most interesting portions of the Lecture was that concerning an ancient folk-tale, which related how the harp of a celebrated bard having been captured by the enemy, the pursuers, "Lugh, the Danan king, and Daghda, the great chief and druid," found it hanging upon the wall of the enemies' banqueting-hall, whereupon the Daghda said: "Come, my harp, give attention to thy musical modes, the modes of spring, summer, and winter." Upon which, the story says, "the harp came forth from the wall and killed nine persons in its passage; and it came to the Daghda, and he played for them the three musical feats which give distinction to the harper—viz., the Suantree, which from its deep murmuring caused sleep; the Gentree, which from its merriment caused laughter; and the Goltree, which from its melting plaintiveness caused crying." This legend is, as the lecturer remarked, of three-fold interest, for it confirms the popular belief in the introduction of music into Ireland by the Danan, a mysterious race, apparently with Greek affinities, whom tradition asserts, after conquering and civilizing the country, disappeared into fairyland; it contains the first reference in Irish literature to the harp or cruit; and it describes three styles of music, characteristic examples of which are respectively found in the "hush songs," "jigs," and "lamentations" of to-day. Of course Mr. Graves had much to say concerning the famous Irish lyrist O'Carolan, born in 1670, the Belfast meetings of harpers in 1792, and the enthusiastic labours of Mr. Bunting. Mr. Graves also quoted from the observations of Mr. Cowley who, while professionally engaged in Dublin, remarked that the ancient Irish harps, which had commonly thirty strings, were tuned in the key of G, and that the most ancient Irish airs were in the ordinary major scale and were played in G. For the sake of variety, however, the harpers sometimes played tunes in A, but without altering the tuning. This procedure formed a minor scale of singular character, often erroneously supposed to be older than the major. The scales of D and E were also used in a similar manner. Another suggestive remark was the similarity, which the lecturer said existed between early Norse and Irish airs, and which had been pointed out to him by the Swedish harpist, Sjöden. Which country annexed them from the other Mr. Graves, however, did not venture to opine. With regard to other countries Mr. Graves was less diffident, even "Sumer is icumen in" and "Robin Adair" being claimed to be of Irish origin.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

By far the largest meeting this season of the Musical Association assembled on the 13th ult., when Captain C. R. Day read a paper on "Indian National Music." With a comprehensiveness born of thorough mastery of his subject, the lecturer commented upon the incalculable antiquity of Indian music, the development of its seventy-two varieties of scales and thirty-five kinds of tempo, and explained the elaborate system which rules the formation of its melodies and dictates the form of its songs and instrumental pieces. Those, however, who would dispel their ignorance on these particulars must be referred to Captain Day's book on "The Music of Southern India," reviewed in The Musical Times for December, 1891, for they are far too many to be mentioned here with the fulness which their interest and importance demand. One point, owing to its remarkable suggestiveness, may be mentioned—viz., in the oldest music, the sacred chants of the Sâma-Veda, the scales, as divided into eight notes, are counted downwards from the fourth of the scale, whereas the secular scales are counted upwards from the key-note. Thus, in the sacred scales the key-note occupies a position the fifth above and a fourth below the extreme limits of the scale, a curious kind of topsy-turveydom of what are commonly known as the Gregorian plagal scales, in which the key-note is the fourth above the lowest note of the scale. A curious analogy to ancient plainsong was also suggested by the value of the notes in the Vedic chants, which are continuous, being entirely dependent upon the words to which they are allied. But even of greater interest than the lecturer's instructive remarks were the examples of the scales, exercises used in teaching, and instrumental pieces played upon the Vina, the national instrument, by Mr. Alaudin Maulabuksh Pathan, son of Professor Maulabuksh, chief musician to H.H. the Gaeckwar of Baroda. It is not too much to say that this gentleman's masterly playing was a revelation to the majority of those present. There are many reasons why Indian music should appear to the European ear chaotic and incoherent. It employs gradations of tone to which we are unaccustomed, it is built upon scales the majority of which are unknown to us, it commonly makes use of strangely mixed rhythms, we are in total ignorance of the ragas or thematic types by which every emotion is specifically represented, and, finally, the music finds in us no associative recollections to which it can appeal. On the occasion in question ignorance in these important particulars was partially dispelled by the scales being played, and the rhythms and form in which the pieces were composed being described previous to their performance. When it is said that some of the rhythms were counted 123, 12, 12, &c.; others being 123, 1234, &c.; and 1234, 1, 12, &c., with the strong beat on the first of each group, some idea may be gained how helpful the explanations proved to the comprehension of the music. This, when thus listened to, proved remarkably expressive, each piece possessing a distinct character, sometimes singularly plaintive, at others passionate or vigorous, the rhythms frequently imparting an indescribable lilt and graceful charm. The extraordinary delicacy and expressive power of the ornamental turns and graces employed, acquired increasing significance as the ear became accustomed to distinguish their apparently endless variety and subtle tonal gradations. Briefly, the longer one listened the more one became impressed with the beauty of this music and convinced that it was ignorance and unfamiliarity that alone prevented its appreciation. When it is recollected how great an influence Slavonic music is now exercising, and it is also remembered how much of its distinctiveness is traceable to the characteristics of Eastern races, the subject of Indian music attains an importance that modern composers would do well to realise. In ancient lore are often found the seeds of life.

DR. PARRY'S "JUDITH" AT PLYMOUTH.

The performance of Dr. Hubert Parry's fine Oratorio "Judith," in the Guildhall, on January 31, gave especial opportunities for the display of the exceptional abilities of Mr. H. Moreton's choir. Some of the finest music of the work being found in the choral numbers, their adequate rendering is of great importance, and consequently no little of the success the work achieved on this occasion may be attributed to the intelligent and earnest endeavours of the choral force. Miss Lucille Hill, although suffering from an indisposition which obliged her withdrawal during the closing numbers of the work, gave most effective expression to "Thou Queen of Israel" and "The Lord is long-suffering." Dr. Parry has written some of his best melodies for the contralto, and Miss Hilda Wilson's rendering of them was one of the most enjoyable parts of the performance. Mr. Edward Houghton being unable to appear, his place was taken by Mr. J. Gawthrop, who fully justified the confidence thus placed in him. Good service was also rendered by Mr. David Hughes and Masters Searle and White. The accompaniments were effectively played by an admirable orchestra, in which Messrs. J. Pardew and J. W. Wingate were the principal violinists. A miscellaneous second part included the three Dances by E. German from the music incidental to "Henry VIII." and songs contributed by the above-named soloists.

"THE DREAM OF JUBAL" AT GRAVESEND.

The second Subscription Concert of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association was given at the New Public Hall, Gravesend, on January 30, Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" being very successfully performed under the direction of the composer, the orchestra and chorus numbering together 150. The vocalists engaged were Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Iver McKay, who sang the solo music with great taste and refinement, while in the concerted music they were joined by Miss Rose Dafforne and Mr. Charles W. Clements, two promising pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. Mr Charles Fry, the original exponent of the part, was engaged to recite Mr. Joseph Bennett's beautiful verses. He discharged his difficult task to the complete satisfaction of the crowded audience, drawing forth continued expressions of approval. The members of the chorus sang with spirit and precision, the magnificent "Gloria in Excelsis" and the grand Finale, "Oh! music voice inspired," in which all the singers engaged seemed impelled to put forth their utmost power, being specially well rendered. At the conclusion of the performance the principal artists and composer were enthusiastically recalled. Before leaving, Dr. Mackenzie complimented Mr. Charles R. Green, the Conductor of the Association, upon the efficient manner in which the chorus had been prepared, and expressed great satisfaction with the performance of the work. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, under the direction of Mr. Charles R. Green, vocal pieces being admirably rendered by the soloists and several interesting instrumental selections by the orchestra.

MR. WADDINGTON'S "JOHN GILPIN" IN LEICESTER.

More than usual interest was attached to the second Concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place in the Temperance Hall, on the 6th ult., the programme including the first performance in Leicester of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana"; and the production of a new setting of Cowper's "John Gilpin," in the form of a choral ballad, by Mr. Sydney P. Waddington, a pupil of the Royal College of Music and Mendelssohn scholar. There is little need to dwell upon the first-named work beyond saying that its characters were effectively impersonated by Madame Elène Eaton as Santuzza, Miss Grace Damian as Lucia and Lola, Mr. Edward Lloyd as Turridu, and Mr. Eugène Oudin as Alfio; and that the chorus and orchestral parts were dramatically rendered by about 300 executants, under the direction of Mr. H. B. Ellis. Mr. Waddington's Ballad realised the hopes which his promising career had given rise to in his townsmen. The humorous spirit of the text is happily echoed in the music, which, throughout, is unpretentious, melodious, and direct in expression. The orchestral scoring gives frequent proof of how well the composer has profited by the course of training he has undergone, and, as a whole, the work is full of promise of yet better things to come from the same pen. It was admirably rendered, and the composer, who conducted, was enthusiastically recalled to the platform at the close. Previous to the performance Mr. Waddington was presented with a handsome gold-mounted ivory bâton by Mr. J. Herbert Marshall, musical director of the Society. The Concert concluded with a miscellaneous selection in which the principal soloists took part.

MR. F. CUNNINGHAM WOODS' "TEMPEST" MUSIC.

Mr. Woods' new music to "The Tempest" was introduced at the performance of Shakespeare's play given by the Oxford University Dramatic Society, on January 31. It was a difficult task to follow Sir Arthur Sullivan, but as the orchestra for which room can be found in the New Theatre is not nearly large enough to execute Sullivan's music, it had to be attempted. The music composed by Mr. Woods consists, so far as main features are concerned, of an Overture and four Entr'actes, and the score is laid out for strings, single wood-wind, and one horn. It may be said at once that the composer achieved wonders with these limited resources. Indeed, the orchestration was so skilful that the deficiencies in the composition of the band almost escaped notice. The Overture is a spirited piece in regular form, but two of the Entr'actes are dances, one of which, the Banquet Dance, was particularly successful. The effect of the music, as a whole, was admirable: "graceful music, cleverly scored," was the general impression that it left, and the composer certainly achieved a distinct success. With judicious reticence the music of Purcell, Arne, and Linley was used for the songs, which were creditably sung by Miss Bruckshaw as Ariel.

OBITUARY.

Mr. W. M. Miller, Superintendent of Music to the Glasgow School Board, Inspector of Psalmody for the Church of Scotland, and for many years Conductor of the Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society, who passed away on the 3rd ult., in his sixty-second year, may be said to have been the pioneer in Glasgow of the Glover-Curwen system. His pupils could be numbered by thousands, and as a teacher in Protestant as well as in Roman Catholic church choirs, and in the Synagogue itself, his enthusiasm in the cause of the musical art was something contagious. To Mr. Miller belongs the credit of reviving several of Handel's lesser-known oratorios; amongst others, "Athaliah" and "Hercules," and if those archaic works did not make an impression of great import, they invariably attracted the musical student to the City Hall. Mr. Miller will be missed in Glasgow musical and artistic circles. He was a kindly-hearted genial man—entirely self-made, let it be recorded with pride—and a staunch friend whom any one might have been proud to know.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:—

Professor L. Lewandowski, for many years director of the choir in the Berlin Synagogue, and, as such, an authority on old Jewish music; on the 4th ult., at Berlin, aged seventy-five.

Professor Theodor Billroth, the famous Vienna surgeon and anatomist, a very accomplished musical amateur and intimate friend of Brahms, who dedicated two of his finest String Quartets (Op. 51) to him. Billroth was writing a book on music at the time of his death, which took place on the 6th ult., at Abbazia. He was sixty-four.

Nicolò Massa, highly esteemed Italian composer of operas, "Il Conte di Chatillon," "Salammbo," "Onesta," "Taide," &c. He died at Genoa, on January 24, aged forty.

Jean Yastrebow, Russian Consul, author of some valuable books on the literature and popular songs of the Serbians and Turks, and similar works. He died at Slavonica, aged fifty-four.

Antoine Dabin, composer and distinguished organist, at Liège, on January 31.

Antoine Joseph Adolphe Sax, the well-known manufacturer and inventor of wind instruments, amongst which the saxophone has become the most popular. He introduced numerous improvements in various instruments, such as the bass clarinet and bassoon, and generally did very great service to military music, especially in France. He died in Paris, aged eighty.

Francesco Ciaffei, formerly a tenor singer who enjoyed a considerable reputation, and whose career was a brilliant one. In 1851 he was in London, and afterwards for twenty-two years at Warsaw, where he became Professor of Singing at the Conservatoire and Director of the Italian Opera. He died at Florence, aged seventy-nine.

Angelo Medori, composer of an opera, "Galiani," and a quantity of sacred music. He died, aged fifty-four, at Viterbe, where he was master of the choir at the Cathedral.

Guillaume Lekeu, violinist and composer of great promise, whose death, at Angers, at the early age of twenty-four, is deplored as a distinct loss to the young Belgian school. Amongst his works are a Violin Sonata (played by Mr. Ysaÿe) and a "Suite d'orchestre sur des thèmes Angevins."

Carl Pielke, formerly an excellent lyric tenor with a beautiful voice; at Jena, on January 15, aged seventy-seven.

Baroness Goethals, née Engler, an accomplished amateur, in whose house in Brussels most of the first artists of the second half of the century, such as Liszt, Rubinstein, De Beriot, Clara Schumann, &c., were frequent guests. She died at Brussels, on January 4.

Ernst Koch, formerly Court opera-singer, afterwards teacher of singing at Stuttgart; on January 18, aged seventy-four.

Xavier Carlier, pianist and composer of promise. He leaves an unfinished symphonic legend, "Humanitas victrix," behind. He died at St. Petersburg, aged thirty-two.

Ernesto Camillo Sivori, the famous violin virtuoso, at Genoa, aged seventy-nine. He was prematurely born the day after his mother had heard Paganini for the first time. He became the favourite, if not the only pupil of that master, who composed six Violin Sonatas for him. At the age of twelve Sivori played in Paris and London, and in the early forties toured through Europe. He was the first to play Mendelssohn's Concerto in England, having introduced it at the London Philharmonic Society's Concert of June 27, 1846. After this he went to America, where he stayed till 1850; he appeared in London for the last time in 1864. His technique is said to have been phenomenal, second only to his teacher's, but his tone was less remarkable. Sivori composed several works for his instrument—concertos, fantasias, &c.—but they are of no value as music.

Madame Laura Schirmer-Mapleson, the well-known American prima donna. At the age of six she sang in public with such success that she was considered a prodigy of much promise. She studied in Europe, and toured for a number of years through Italy, Germany, Russia, and Turkey. Two years ago she was married to the impresario Col. Henry Mapleson. She died at New York.

By the death of Aynsley Cook, a link is severed which connected the past with the present of English opera. Born in 1836, he made the theatre his home at an early age, and thus participated for nearly half-a-century in the life of the lyric drama. His répertoire was said to consist of not far short of 100 operas, and his ability was of the most versatile order. After an illness of only a fortnight's duration he expired at his rooms in Canning Street, Liverpool, on the 15th ult. His final appearance on the stage had taken place on the 2nd ult., and a week or so previously he had fulfilled his last Concert engagement on the platform of St. George's Hall, at one of the meetings of the Liverpool Sunday Society. His Requiem was sung at Leet Street Catholic Church, and he was buried at Anfield Cemetery on the 20th ult.

Mr. John Kirk, a well-known and accomplished organist and musician, resident at Sheffield, passed to his rest on the 5th ult., much to the regret of a large number of friends. He was only forty-eight years of age, and had been for twenty-seven years organist of St. Marie's Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. W. J. Burville, music teacher and assistant-vicar choral at Hereford Cathedral, to which he was attached for forty-two years. He was born at Canterbury, and was a chorister in the Cathedral at the same time as the late Sir George Elvey and Dr. Longhurst. For twenty years he was music-master at Hereford Cathedral School. He died at Hereford, on the 9th ult., aged sixty-eight.

The sudden death of Dr. H. W. Dulcken, on the 4th ult., will long be deplored by a large circle of friends to whom he was greatly endeared by his extreme amiability. Dr. Dulcken was the son of the famous pianist and friend of Mendelssohn, Madame Dulcken, of whom Queen Victoria took lessons. He was an accomplished linguist and historian, and his memory was phenomenal. Among the many literary works of which he was author or editor, may be named "The book of German Songs from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century." He occasionally contributed to The Musical Times, and translated the libretti of several musical works.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On January 26 the Philharmonic Society gave its third Subscription Concert of the season in the Ulster Hall, when the usual large and fashionable audience crowded the building. The artists engaged were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Philip Newbury, and Mr. Eugène Oudin; with Mr. Maurice Sons, solo violinist, and Mr. Esposito, solo pianist. The programme was miscellaneous, the members of the Society simply giving two anthems—the first, Mendelssohn's "My God, my God," and the other, Berlioz's Easter anthem, "Christ is risen," both of which were sung with excellent taste under the bâton of Mr. F. Koeller. Mr. Louis Werner displayed good taste in his pianoforte accompaniments.

On the 12th ult. Mr. H. B. Phillips, of Londonderry, gave a miscellaneous Concert in the Ulster Hall, which was poorly attended, notwithstanding a rather formidable list of artists—namely, Madame Alice Gomez, Mdlle. Rosina Isidor, Miss Carrie Curnow, Mr. Philip Newbury, Professor Max Pauer, Mr. Ronchini, Mr. C. Phillips, and Miss Kathleen Hamilton; Mr. Watkis acting as Conductor.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The most important musical event of the past month was the Concert given by the Festival Choral Society, on the 8th ult., at which Max Bruch's cantata "The Lay of the Bell" was produced, with Professor Stanford's choral setting of Tennyson's stirring poem "The Revenge." The former work was first heard here at our Festival of 1879, and has been repeated once or twice since by this Society. It is a work of the serious, noble order, massive in much of its choral writing, and masterly in its technical qualities throughout. Miss Marie Fillunger acquitted herself finely of the rather trying soprano part; as on a former occasion, her vocal style was much admired. Miss Brema, Mr. E. Branscombe, and Mr. Watkin Mills discharged the other solo parts. Despite the excellent attractions offered this season by this Society, the attendance at these Concerts seems to have fallen off somewhat. Is it that a gradual change in public taste has come about during the past few years; that works of the big order, works dependent upon grandiose effects of chorus and orchestra, no longer please as formerly? Has the "short story," in musical parallel, pushed out the three-volume novel?

Mr. Turner, of the Grand Theatre, is yet successfully holding the stage with English opera, despite the keen rivalry of pantomime at the two older houses, the Royal and the Prince of Wales'. (By the way, a new theatre has lately been opened at Aston—a very pretty building, but not laying much claim to notice, as yet, in other respects.) After playing the round of more or less popular operas, to certain of which we referred last month, Mr. Turner has distinguished his season by a very praiseworthy production of "The Flying Dutchman" (12th ult. and other nights). This opera was first performed in Birmingham by the Carl Rosa Company. It was our very first lesson, indeed, in Wagnerian music. It was repeated on successive visits of that company, and Mr. Ludwig, the Vanderdecken of the performances, again appeared in the same rôle on this occasion; and a most complete, artistic performance it was. Miss Chrystal Duncan made a very pleasing Senta; while Mr. Turner himself occupied the important, if in one respect small, part of the Steersman of the phantom bark. Altogether, we are indebted to the enterprising Mr. Turner for an interesting revival. Members of the company gave a Sacred Concert, on Sunday, the 11th ult., in aid of the poor children's Boot fund, at which an overflowing audience assembled, the programme of course being of the most popular kind.

The party of young performers entitling themselves the Birmingham String Quartet gave another of their Concerts, on the 13th ult., in the Institute Lecture Theatre. Mozart's Quartet (No. 5) in A and Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) were among the chief features. Miss Linda Morton, as solo pianist, in her rendering of Chopin's Ballade in G minor, made a good impression.

Another of Messrs. Harrison's Concerts—the musical events of our Birmingham society—has been given, at which Madame Nettie Carpenter (violin) and Miss Adelina de Lara (pianoforte) were the instrumental soloists.

Miss Fanny Davies gave her annual Concert on the 20th ult., at the Masonic Hall. She was supported by Dr. Joachim and Signor Piatti. Five numbers of Schumann's "Kreisleriana"—one of the most characteristic and intime of the composer's pianoforte works, but, strange to say, comparatively little heard—a Ballade and a Romanza of Brahms, and the Rondo in G of Beethoven constituted the pianist's share of the programme, as respects the solo pieces. With her coadjutors she also played in Schubert's Trio in B flat and in Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor. Dr. Joachim gave as his solo the Suite in E major (violin solus) of Bach; while Signor Piatti produced a Violoncello Sonata by Valentini.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Jubilee of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society, which was celebrated by a couple of Concerts at the Victoria Rooms in the first week of February, proved a great success. New compositions were secured for the event, and these, together with some of the choicest examples in the répertoire of the Society, constituted the programmes. The novelties were "Sing, who mingles with my lays," W. H. Cummings; "Love wakes and weeps" (tenor solo), Harper Kearton; and "Linger, twilight, linger," J. L. Roeckel; while prizes for the best original compositions offered to the students of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music were won by C. Macpherson with his setting of "There sits a bird," and by H. Walford Davies with his treatment of "The Sturdy Rock." These pieces, which were brought forward at the Concert on the 18th ult., were received by the audience with much favour. Mr. Roeckel directed the performance of his work, and Dr. J. F. Bridge and Mr. C. Lee Williams conducted pieces from their pens inserted in the scheme, although not written expressly for the Jubilee. Mr. Harper Kearton was the soloist. In the singing the Society maintained its accustomed standard of excellence, except that for some apparently unaccountable reason the voices flattened considerably in each piece.

At the second Concert, on the 3rd ult., the Students' Prize Glees were repeated, but the programme was mostly made up of some of the finest examples of older English writers. Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Watkin Mills were the soloists. Better artistic results attended the performance, for the weather being more crisp there was not that air of languor and that flattening of the voices so apparent two days previously. Mr. Riseley and the members of the Society are to be congratulated on the success of the Jubilee celebration.

On the 5th ult. the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society gave a Concert at Bridgwater, for the benefit of the local Infirmary. Many of the compositions were the same as appeared in the Bristol programmes a few days before. Miss Florence Cromey and Mr. W. Thomas were the soloists. All the pieces were admirably sung, and gave great pleasure to the large audience, who have few opportunities of hearing such perfect part-singing as that of the famous body of Bristol vocalists. Mr. Riseley conducted.

Kingswood and District Choral Society gave a Concert on January 23, under the direction of Mr. J. F. Nash, the able trainer and Conductor. Bennett's "May Queen" was the chief work brought forward, and this was praiseworthily interpreted, the soloists being Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Fifoot, Mr. B. Shearman, and Mr. W. Thomas. Miss Rose Thomas excellently played the overture and accompaniment on the pianoforte. Miscellaneous pieces made up the second part of the programme. Vincent's Choral Fantasia on National Airs gave great delight, and Sir George Macfarren's "The Cuckoo sings" and Bishop's "The Fisherman's Good-night" went well. Miss Cromey and Mr. Thomas contributed songs, and Miss Maud Riseley played violin solos, her sister acting as accompanist.

Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was performed at Redland Park Hall on January 25, by a choir of fifty voices, under the direction of Mr. Samuel Rootham. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Brettelle, Miss Wetherman, Mr. A. M. Warren, Mr. M. Griffiths, and Mr. W. N. Tribe. The artistic results, although not without fault, were very creditable.

At Miss Lock's Popular Chamber Concert, on the 12th ult., Brahms's Clarinet Quintet (Op. 115) and Beethoven's Septet in E flat (Op. 20) were brought forward, and were admirably performed by our local executants, who were joined by celebrated players from London. Miss Marie Gane was the vocalist. The Concert was attended by a crowded assemblage, who greatly relished the unfolding of the two fine works named.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The Dublin University Choral Society gave its first Concert for the season on the afternoon of the 3rd ult., in Trinity College. The programme was made up of selections from two of Weber's operas, "Der Freischütz" and "Preciosa." The performance was a most creditable and enjoyable one, and was a bright augury for the Society's season. The principal vocalists were Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, Miss Annie Shellard, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Thomas Marchant. Sir Robert Stewart conducted with his well approved ability.

The second Concert of the Dublin Musical Society took place at the Royal University Buildings on the evening of the 19th ult., and was both an artistic and (if one may judge from the appearance of the hall) a financial success. The work chosen for presentation was Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," an Oratorio often given before by the Society, but on this occasion first performed in Dublin with Sir Michael Costa's accompaniments. The well-balanced orchestra of seventy performers gave a good account of the added and exchanged parts, and the choir of 300 vocalists was well up to its high standard of efficiency. The solo vocalists were Miss Maggie Davies (her first appearance here), whose admirable intonation and good taste are a passport to the favour of any audience whose favour is worth having; Miss McConnell; Mr. Ben Davies, whom we have many times heard in Dublin, and always with increased pleasure; and Mr. Charles Kelly, a local and most popular cathedral vocalist. Mr. Thomas Werner led the strings, Mr. John Horan, sen., was Organist, and Dr. Joseph Smith conducted with his usual ability, intensity, and sang froid.

St. George's Choral Union, an excellent and industrious Society on the North side of the city, commenced its season with an admirable performance of "The Messiah," at St. George's Parochial Hall, on the 9th ult., under the direction of its Conductor, Mr. Raymond Revelle. The principal soloists were Miss Florence Hewson, Mrs. Bradford, Mr. Lowther Campbell, and Mr. J. G. Scott. The band and choir numbered eighty performers, the leader being Mr. A. C. Fleming. Where are the numerous South city choral societies that started into existence on the much-regretted suppression of St. Patrick's Oratorio Society—the most industrious of all our musical associations? It is to be hoped that they will not be long before showing signs of life. No less is it to be hoped that the Oratorios at St. Patrick's may be revived at no distant period.

The Chamber Music Recitals under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society are transferred back to Leinster House, and are now held in the library, pending the reconstruction of the lecture theatre. On the 5th and 12th ult. the programme was as follows: Beethoven's String Quartet in G minor (Op. 18), Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violoncello, and Rubinstein's Quartet in C major (Op. 66) for pianoforte and strings. The execution was in the most artistic style, and was received with much applause. On the 19th ult. the performance included the "Kreutzer" Sonata and a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Schumann. Messrs. Papini, Delaney, Grisard, and Bast are the string quartet, and Mr. Esposito the pianist.

The last of Mr. Werner's series of twelve Violin Recitals was announced to take place at the Molesworth Hall on the 13th ult., but, owing to the illness of the virtuoso, had to be postponed to the 20th. The programme included Spohr's "Concerto dramatique," Sarasate's Fantasia on "Carmen," and Wilhelmj's "Valse Diabolique."

Two Opera Concerts by the principals of the Georgina Burns and Leslie Crotty Company were given in the Antient Concert Rooms, on January 26 and the 10th ult.; and two Concerts, under the management of Mr. Farley Sinkins, took place in the same locale on the 14th and 15th ult., the vocalists including Misses Alice Gomez, Rosina Isidor, and Estrella Bellinfante, with Messrs. Philip Newbury and Chas. Philips.

The recently inaugurated Leinster Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians now numbers sixty-six members. Two sectional meetings have been held at the Arts Club, at the first of which Sir Robert Stewart presided, and a paper on "Gounod" was read by Dr. J. C. Culwick, followed by a short concert of Gounod's works. At the second meeting, Mr. W. H. Vipond Barry read a paper on "Some Modern Organ Writers," and a selection of madrigals was announced for performance by the members.

Sir Arthur Sullivan has accepted the invitation of the Dublin Musical Society to conduct a Concert in Dublin, on April 12, consisting of his "Martyr of Antioch" and other selections from his compositions. Great interest is taken already in this event.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The feature of the winter season in Edinburgh has been Messrs. Paterson's scheme of Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts. They were "popular" only so far as price goes—in programme and performance alike the standard was uniformly high. On the 3rd ult. a huge audience came to hear the Pastoral Symphony and the Overtures to "Freischütz" and "William Tell." Mr. Maurice Sons was the soloist in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, which, in consequence of a mistake on the part of the librarian, had to be substituted at the last moment for Bruch in G minor.

This contretemps made his notable success the more ungrudgingly acknowledged. Mr. Henschel himself was the vocalist and contributed Wolfram's Fantasy from "Tannhäuser," Beethoven's "Song of Crugantino," and Loewe's "Henry the Fowler" in his own inimitable way. With Spartan-like consistency he submitted to his own rule and refused the warm encore offered him. Of the two Concerts of the regular series which fall to be noticed this month, the programmes included Dr. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid" and a selection from the "Meistersinger," and on the 13th ult., the anniversary of the composer's death, a few excerpts from Wagner's operas, with the "Eroica" Symphony. The choral part of the "Story of Sayid" was rendered by Mr. Kirkhope's Choir in the manner which has now become its happy tradition. Some of the soloists were not so successful owing to colds and other incapacitating reasons. Mr. Bispham, however, achieved a distinct success in the Prince music. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir fairly eclipsed its reputation in the concluding choruses from the "Meistersinger." Most artistic performances were given of Pogner's song by Mr. Bispham, of the "Preislied" by Mr. Iver McKay, and of the Apprentices' Dance by the orchestra. The Wagner Commemoration Concert was no less successful, and we owe a deep debt of gratitude for one of the most glorious interpretations of the "Eroica" ever heard in Edinburgh. Miss Fillunger had to undertake Miss Palliser's songs (Elizabeth's "Dich theure Halle" and Isolde's Liebestod) at very short notice, but she was most warmly thanked by a crowded and enthusiastic house.

At the last of the Glasgow Choral Union Orchestra's Concerts, Mr. Manns was greeted by a crowded hall. Mr. Ysaÿe's personality proved a great attraction, and his magnificent displays of genuine virtuosity in Saint-Saëns's Concerto and two movements by Bach were immensely applauded. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's "Italian."

On the 10th ult. Messrs. Wood found the names of Sir Charles and Lady Hallé powerful enough to secure a large and highly appreciative audience. The programme included selections from the works of Weber (A flat Sonata), Chopin (C sharp minor study), Handel, Beethoven (Op. 96), Schumann (Op. 73), &c. Villiers Stanford's "Four Irish Pieces" (violin), played for the first time, elicited an enthusiastic encore, and Lady Hallé repeated the Reel movement.

At the Second Concert of the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestra the public attention centred in what proved to be a very capable rendering of the "Emperor" Concerto. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 2, and the patrons, of what is certainly the best Amateur Orchestra in Scotland, had every reason to be satisfied with the rendering of these as of the other lighter pieces in the programme.

Mr. Leonard Borwick, on the 17th ult., more than justified the high expectations London papers had raised in us. In Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, the first, second, and fourth movements of Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, the Pastorale by Scarlatti, and the twelfth Rhapsodie, the pianist faithfully reflected every turn of the composers' intentions in a manner which it would be feeble praise to call artistic and in the highest degree poetical. A fairly large audience was roused to a pitch of enthusiasm before the young Englishman had reached the last number on the programme.

Professor Niecks's interesting scheme of historical Concerts, to illustrate the development of dramatic music, have increased in general interest as the learned Professor has approached near the general "ken"; and a corresponding improvement in attendance has naturally followed. At the fourth Concert, on the 14th ult., the class-room was quite filled by the regular students and the musical world of Edinburgh, professional and amateur. The programme included two short songs from J. A. Hiller's operas; a very large and representative part of Gluck's immortal "Iphigenie en Tauride," sung by five soloists and a capable chorus; and most of the second act of the "Magic Flute."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

An uncommonly strong performance of "Israel in Egypt" was given by the Glasgow Choral Union on the 1st ult.; some of the choruses were, indeed, sung with remarkable vocal power; the "Hailstone Chorus" had to be repeated, and "The Lord is a man of war"—sung as usual by all the tenors and basses—again showed the fine qualities of the bass voices. Altogether, Mr. Joseph Bradley, who conducted Handel's greatest choral work, must be felicitated on the results of his training; the band was in good trim, and the solos had able exponents in Mesdames Belle Cole and Annie Marriott and Mr. Henry Piercy. The audience was good—atmospheric influences duly considered; but a couple of nights later on St. Andrew's Hall was crowded in every corner to bid good-bye for the season to Mr. August Manns. The programme was, as usual, on plebiscite lines, and included the "Leonora" (No. 3) and "Tannhäuser" Overtures, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and the inevitable "Cavalleria Rusticana" Intermezzo. All round the performances were of the highest order, though we dare say paramount interest centred in the Sydenham chef's short speech at the close of the Concert. It was hardly possible, it must be admitted, to avoid reference to the Scottish Orchestra Company's scheme. There are many, moreover, who think that Mr. Manns's views regarding a compromise on the basis of "Peace with Honour" is a feasible solution of a very perplexing problem. Anyhow, Mr. Manns's reception was so overwhelming that the audience united in singing "Auld Lang Syne" before the veteran Conductor was allowed to begin his speech.

The features of the Chamber Concert given in the Queen's Rooms, on the 8th ult., were the exceptionally fine viola playing of Mr. Ferir and the finished performance of Mendelssohn's Octet by Mr. Sons and his coadjutors; and at the Scottish Orchestra Company's Popular Concert, on the 10th ult., Mr. Henschel submitted Haydn's Symphony in C (No. 7), the "Rienzi" Overture, and a familiar enough selection from Berlioz's "Faust." The Company's ninth Classical Concert possessed unusual interest, inasmuch as with one exception—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—the programme was entirely Wagnerian. On this occasion the band was, moreover, augmented, and with surprisingly powerful effects at the wind desks. The programme comprised the "Procession of the gods" ("Rheingold"), the Prelude and Isolde's Liebestod ("Tristan"), and "The Ride of the Walkyries," and in each and every piece splendid achievements have to be recorded. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Marie Fillunger, who sang Elizabeth's Greeting with true artistic perception.

On the 15th ult. the Glasgow Society of Musicians entertained Mr. Henschel at dinner. The chair was occupied by Mr. Julius Seligmann, the esteemed President of the Society, and a very large and representative gathering turned out in honour of the guest of the evening.

Last month's miscellaneous Concerts included a Recital of sacred music in the Barony Parish Church, when Mr. Albert E. Bridge's choristers gave an excellent account of Spohr's tuneful and popular cantata "God, Thou art great." The annual Concert given by the directors of the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music, on the 6th ult., attracted, as usual, a very large audience to St. Andrew's Hall. An interesting and varied programme had been prepared by the Principal, Mr. Allan Macbeth, and foremost amongst many good things stood the singing of a couple of choruses from Rheinberger's Mass in E flat, showing that the Ladies' Choir in connection with this flourishing establishment is as competent as ever. Henry Gadsby's fine cantata "The Lord of the Isles," so popular hereabouts, was given by the Glasgow Eastern Choral Society on January 30, too late, of course, for notice in last month's Musical Times. The performance, under Mr. George Taggart's skilful direction, was, however, so uniformly good that it merits recognition even at this late hour. At Greenock the local Choral Union, conducted by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, also came to the front on the evening of the 2nd ult., with admirable performances of Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "The Sleeping Beauty" and the third act of "Tannhäuser."

The prize of £15, offered by the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club for the best Glee, has been gained by Mr. Charles Wood, organist of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, and who is also one of the Professors at the Royal College of Music, and the Conductor of the orchestra of the Cambridge University Musical Society.

The adjudicators were Sir Joseph Barnby and Dr. F. E. Gladstone, and of the various compositions submitted they say: "We found the general standard of excellence distinctly high, and we cannot help recording our gratification that so truly admirable and national a school of music still lives and flourishes amongst us." This is cheering.

The regrettable death of Mr. W. M. Miller is referred to in our Obituary column.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The resignation of Mr. W. T. Best as Organist to the Corporation was wired from Liverpool to every centre of importance as soon as it was read at the February meeting of the City Council, and made known to the public the following day, while the month was yet young. It is therefore needless here to allude at any great length to the subject, and it will be more to the point to state that in all probability a considerable interregnum will take place before a successor is appointed to the console at St. George's Hall. Mr. Best's condition has for a lengthy period been so precarious that his resignation, though it is regretted, did not come as a surprise; and in the immediate future, as in the comparatively recent past, good local organists will be found to preside at the instrument over which he has worthily held chief control for so many years. At the meeting of the Finance Committee of the Corporation held subsequently to that of the Council at large, the chairman said they would all receive with the deepest regret the announcement of Mr. Best's retirement. Mr. Best was the most eminent organist in the country. He was a Liverpool man, and one of whom they could feel proud. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That the Council receive with very great regret the resignation of Mr. W. T. Best, Corporation organist, who during the long period of thirty-five years has presided at the organ in St. George's Hall; the eminent, and in some respects unrivalled, position which he holds in his profession has caused his official connection with the municipality to reflect honour on the city, and he carries with him in his retirement the thanks of the Council for his valuable and highly appreciated services, and also their sincere hope that rest from professional work may result in Mr. Best's restoration to health." It was also decided to have the resolution engrossed.

A Mozart Symphony (No. 1, in D, of the Leipzig Edition) held the place of honour at the Philharmonic Concert given on the 6th ult., the second position of importance being allotted to Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, the solo part of which was excellently played by Mr. Willy Hess. The chorus had very little to do and are assumed to be saving themselves for Liszt's "Legend of St. Cecilia." The latter was fixed for the 27th ult. and therefore too late for present notice. The Liverpool Orchestral Society gave C. H. Parry's "English" Symphony at the City Hall on the 3rd ult., under Mr. Rodewald, the performance being one of the best on their already excellent record. Mr. Weingartner, one of the leading members of the local professorate, gave his annual Concert the same afternoon, and re-introduced his opera "Fridolin" to his friends and pupils. The artist last-named has gained breadth of style and promises with greater maturity to take high rank as a violinist. The last Concert but one of the Sunday Society fell on the 18th ult., when an orchestral programme of the usual high class was presented. Messrs. Harrison have given one of their Subscription Concerts, with a large muster of star artists, at the Philharmonic Hall, and Mr. T. Shaw has continued his popular Saturday evenings at Hope Hall.

The local choral societies have, as yet, made no sign further than the promise of "Elijah," with Mr. Santley in the titular character, by the Musical Society. At the Pro-Cathedral, Mr. F. H. Burstall is preparing Gounod's "Redemption" for early dates in March, and announces that "desiring to make this a noteworthy performance he has arranged for trumpets, drums, and a harp to supplement the organ accompaniment."

The Chester Musical Festival is fixed for July 25, 26, and 27, the choral works promised being Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Verdi's "Requiem," Handel's "Messiah," Cherubini's D minor Mass, C. H. Parry's "Judith," and Sullivan's "Golden Legend." The novelty of the gathering will be a new Symphony in F, by Dr. J. C. Bridge, the Cathedral Organist and Conductor of the Festival.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

Perhaps the most interesting pieces in the varied programme wherewith the Vocal Society of Dr. Watson closed the month of January, were Dr. Martin's Hymn "Holy Spirit, come, O come," in which several of the effects were charming, and a pleasing Part-song by the Conductor, embodying a melody said to have been sung by the Waits in the time of Charles the Second. In the same hall (that of the Gentlemen's Concert Society) a larger audience than usual assembled in the afternoon of the 7th ult., to welcome the re-appearance of Mr. Siloti, who, near the close of last season, won so much favour as an exponent of modern pianoforte music. At this later Recital his powers were especially displayed in a selection from the works of the latest Russian composers, although all through the performance there was a thoroughly enjoyable exhibition of the varied qualifications of an artist of the first rank.

On the 19th ult. an evening Concert was given, at which Sir Charles and Lady Hallé gave in perfection some concerted chamber music and Mr. Alfred Jordan supplied the songs; and we look forward to the enjoyment, early in March, of one of the pleasing and instructive Lecture-Recitals of Miss Wakefield.

At the Free Trade Hall, February was ushered in worthily. It was so long since Bach's Triple Concerto in C had been heard that, as rendered by Miss Olga Néruda, Mr. F. Dawson, and Sir Charles Hallé, to the advantage of finished interpretation was added that of novelty. Later in the evening Chopin's Rondo in C for two pianofortes was given by Miss Néruda and Sir Charles with a unity of purpose replete with that readiness of co-operation which should characterise all duet-playing or singing. The Symphony was the No. 2 of Brahms, so delightful in many of its sections—especially in the first division of the Allegro non troppo, with its beautiful second theme of almost Mendelssohnian suavity, and in the Allegretto grazioso—but of that length of excessive development which, although it has been described as "heavenly," is somewhat trying to mortals. The Orchestral Suite of Stojowski (Op. 9) may, politely, be classed as music of Gipsy wildness; but, perhaps more faithfully, as little better than a series of dangerous experiments in orchestration. Mrs. Henschel and Miss Agnes Janson varied, by a little vocal music, a programme in which, undoubtedly, instrumental works formed the chief attraction. One of the chief choral undertakings of the season—Liszt's "St. Elizabeth"—was not altogether new to many of our amateurs who delight to spend their winter evenings in the study of works not too hurriedly brought forward here in fit style. Of far higher calibre than Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," performed here recently, its earnest seriousness commands a respect occasionally deepening into complete absorption in a story which, in itself, scarcely commends itself to an English audience. But it must be confessed that the texts scarcely justify such lengthy treatment; and that the peculiarity of Liszt's mode of thematic development—or, rather, insistence—becomes intensely wearisome after the opening scenes. The performance was admirable throughout. The choir has not been heard to greater advantage this season; and it excited hopes of what Mr. Wilson may be able to achieve with his singers in the forthcoming performance of "Israel in Egypt," in which the choral effects are so massive. Miss Thudichum threw great expression into many phrases of the part of the heroine, Mr. Black was admirable, and Mr. Ffrangçon Davies, with some self abnegation, undertook the small portion assigned to him; while Mrs. Hess bravely stepped into the gap caused by the absence of a lady whose non-appearance might, otherwise, have caused serious inconvenience. The programme for the 15th ult. was a perfectly ideal one, including Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, so redolent of life and freshness; the Concert-Overture in G of Cherubini, decidedly his most symphonic and spontaneous work; and that greatest of violin Concerti, the Beethoven in D, translated inimitably by Joachim; while Miss Trebelli supplied well chosen and cleverly executed vocal music. Altogether the evening was the most enjoyable of the session.

The Saturday evening Concerts go on successfully at St. James's and the Association Halls. Madame Patey took a sympathetic farewell of her admirers here at Mr. Barrett's, and Mr. Dawson has again displayed his clear and incisive mastery of the pianoforte. At Mr. Cross's entertainments, Dr. Allison played a new Concerto, the slow movement of which was warmly received.

But among our Saturday evening entertainments a new and very promising effort has been made. The majority of our best instrumentalists, busy during all the other evenings of the week, are comparatively at liberty on the closing night, and they have, very judiciously, united themselves as the Manchester Orchestral Association, not only for outside engagements, but to supply a long-felt want here, and to provide music of high class for those amateurs not allured by Ballad Concerts and star vocalists. The four meetings of this second season have been most successful artistically, and financially promising. Only perseverance is required for the firm establishment of regular entertainments, forming a popular reflex of the more serious Symphonic Concerts of Sir Charles Hallé. Not only as a whole are the performances excellent—except, perhaps, that a better balance of strings and brass is desirable—but there are in almost each section soloists of very great skill and equal to any possible demand. The oboe playing of Mr. Charles Reynolds, the quartet of horns, led by Mr. Paersch, and the tone and execution of Mr. Lalande on the bassoon are unsurpassed. An extra Concert is announced at which it is hoped that the Conductor of the Association, Signor Risegari, who has unfortunately been of late too ill to assume control, may be able to take the bâton, which has, during his absence, been efficiently wielded by Mr. W. G. Jaeger.

At the City Council meeting, on the 21st ult., a petition was adopted praying the Queen to grant a Charter of Incorporation to the Manchester Royal College of Music. It is attached to Owens College, and seeks power to confer its own degrees, which will place students on the same footing as in London.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Throughout this district we have strong proofs of the growing influence of music among the people. During the month the religious bodies have held their annual meetings, and the formal proceedings have been varied by part-songs and anthems from the church and chapel choirs. On the 1st ult. Madame Patey paid a visit to Hanley in connection with her provincial farewell tour. Mrs. Helen Trust and Mr. Norman Salmond were prominent members of the Concert party. The Committee of the Meakin series of Popular Concerts deserve to be complimented on the excellence of their programmes. The band of the Royal Artillery furnished the chief attractions at the sixth Concert of this season. Miss Ingrid Pasch was the only vocalist. Mr. D'Oyly Carte's Opera Company opened a twelve nights' engagement at the Theatre Royal, Hanley, on the 5th ult. "Patience" and "Haddon Hall" drew crowded houses during the first week, and the production of the latest Sullivan and Gilbert success, "Utopia, Limited," during the second. The Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society will make an effort to eclipse all its previous performances by the forthcoming production of Handel's "Solomon." A strong list of principals and a band, mainly drawn from Manchester and Birmingham, has just been issued. The Sir Smith Child Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season at Tunstall on the 22nd ult. The programme consisted of glees, madrigals, and part-songs, under the conductorship of Mr. James Alcock. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be given in April. T. Mee Pattison's cantata "A day with our Lord" was performed by the Congregational Church Choir at Burslem, on the 12th ult. The solos were all taken by members of the choir, Mr. W. Wooley and Mr. J. W. Hartley acting as choirmaster and organist respectively.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

The Sacred Harmonic Society provided a great treat for its patrons on January 25, when a "Beethoven Concert" filled the programme. The first part consisted of "Engedi," the miscellaneous second part including the C minor Symphony, the March and Chorus from "The Ruins of Athens," with such gems as "Adelaide" (charmingly sung by Mr. Ben Davies), "In questa tomba" (sung by Mr. Charles Manners), and "Ah! perfido," in which Madame Fanny Moody gained a success. The beautiful Vesper Hymn for soli and chorus was warmly applauded, and ought to be heard more frequently. Under the able direction of Mr. Adcock the chorus has reached a very high point of efficiency, and, with such a fine band as that assembled under his bâton, this "Beethoven Night" should be remembered as a credit to the Society and the town.

On January 31 the London Wind Instrument Society appeared at Mr. Allen's third Classical Concert. The whole programme, including Mozart's Quintet in E flat and Beethoven's Quintet in E flat, was faultlessly played, and ought to have attracted a larger audience. The less known excerpts, Saint-Saëns's Caprice, Pessard's Aubade, and Ludwig Thuille's lovely Sextet for pianoforte and wind instruments, were enthusiastically received.

Mr. Arthur Richards organised a capital Recital of "Pagliacci" for the 5th ult., in which Mr. F. S. Gilbert, Mr. J. Turner, Miss Norledge, and Mr. W. H. Burgon took part. It was preceded by a performance of Mr. Richards's new humorous cantata "Is there a man in the moon?" sung by the choirboys of St. John's.

Herr Ellenberger closed his sixth season of Chamber Concerts on the 15th ult., when Fräulein K. Ellenberger, Herr Ellenberger, Miss Tarbolton, Herr Carl Courvoisier, and Mr. Edwin Thorpe were the executants. The audience showed much enthusiasm.

All lovers of organ music will regret the cessation of the Saturday Recitals at the Mechanics' Institution. Mr. Lemare made his final bow to a large audience on the 3rd ult., and received an ovation which must have been gratifying.

By the kindness of an enthusiastic amateur, our musical public heard three fine Concerts by the Royal Artillery Band on the 8th, 9th, and 10th ult., the programmes being alternately operatic, classical, and popular. The vocalists engaged were Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Marie Hooton, and Mr. Henry Pyatt. The popularity of orchestral performances here would warrant the organisation of a first class orchestra. We hear of the formation of a Ladies' Orchestra by Herr Ellenberger, and of another large amateur combination by Mr. J. H. Wakefield. Probably these are only the forerunners of a stronger movement.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Sarum Choral Society has "The Messiah" in preparation for the forthcoming Easter Concert. Mr. F. L. Bartlett has been appointed Conductor in the place of Mr. South, whose continued ill-health is sincerely regretted by all with whom he has been associated.

The Test Valley Musical Society made its first appearance this season at the Guildhall, Winchester, on the 1st ult., when a large and brilliant audience welcomed Mr. Moberly and his body of 180 performers, with the cordiality usually extended to old friends. The excellent band of the Society, consisting entirely of strings and numbering about fifty, led on this occasion by Mr. A. Foley, introduced two novelties: Ballade for string orchestra (Op. 1), De Greef; and a movement from Alexandre Glazounow's Suite (Op. 25), both of which created considerable interest by reason of their originality and force. These works were admirably played, a remark which also applies to Robert Fuchs's rarely heard Serenade in D (Op. 9) and to Schubert's Minuet (No. 3). A marked feature of the Concert was the unaccompanied part-singing of the chorus, a charming madrigal by Professor Stanford, "Sweet love for me," receiving a particularly fine rendering. Miss Margaret Barter, the solo vocalist, was most successful in her songs, and was recalled after each appearance. The Rev. E. H. Moberly was, of course, the Conductor, and he is to be congratulated upon another addition to the already long list of successes achieved by this excellent Society under his direction.

At the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on the following day, the Concert was repeated.

The Southampton Philharmonic Society gave a successful Concert on January 20, in the Philharmonic Hall. The principal number of the programme was Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," in which the solos were taken by Miss Clara Dowle, Miss Amy B. Martin, and Mr. Hirwen Jones. The orchestra, led by Mr. E. Jones, was an excellent one, and the choruses were sung with marked precision and intelligence. Mr. H. M. Pike conducted.

At the South Front Church, on the 13th ult., Fawcett's Oratorio "Paradise" was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Merefield. The soloists were Miss Kate McLaughlin, Miss Laura Goodrich, Mr. C. French, and Mr. W. Wheeler. Mr. F. Hallum presided at the organ, and the band was led by Mr. J. Merefield.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

Though during the twelvemonth there is much music heard in Leeds, it can hardly be said that either the quantity or the quality of its Concerts is in excess of what might be expected from a town of over three hundred thousand inhabitants, with a reputation for musical proclivities arising, no doubt, from its triennial Festival and the strong lungs of its chorus-singers. During the past month, however, there has been more than an average allowance of Concerts, among which the third of the Subscription Concerts, given on the 14th ult., is in every respect pre-eminent. The programme was of exceptional interest. Beginning with Beethoven's Third Rasoumowsky Quartet in C and ending with the F minor Quintet of Brahms (Op. 34), it included solos by Dr. Joachim, Mr. Piatti, and Mr. Leonard Borwick. The last-named artist made, on this occasion, his first appearance in Leeds, a fact indicative of the enterprise of the town in musical matters, and made, it is needless to add, a very favourable impression by his consummately artistic playing, especially of Chopin's Second Ballade in F. In his reading of this work there was, in addition to his usual technical perfection, an unusual degree of poetic fire. The performers in the concerted pieces, other than those already mentioned, were Messrs. C. R. Briggs and Alfred Gibson, who completed an ensemble of almost ideal refinement and excellence. The singing of Madame Bertha Moore was in perfect harmony with the character of the Concert, and the finished accompaniments of Miss Eisele deserve cordial recognition. On the 5th ult. Mr. J. Müller, a local violinist, gave a Recital of violin music, playing among other things Beethoven's Concerto and two movements from Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto, with much vigour and breadth of style. Miss Kate Smith accompanied very efficiently. A similar Concert was given on the 9th ult., by Messrs. Christensen (pianoforte) and Giessing (violoncello), who were heard together in one of Beethoven's Pianoforte and Violoncello Sonatas. The programme also included some of Mr. Christensen's own compositions, an air from his light opera "Kenilworth," sung by Miss Rhodes, proving especially effective. On the 8th ult. a Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given by an accomplished young Parisian artist, Miss Dubray, with the assistance of Miss Fleischmann as violinist. The chief feature of the programme was Hans Huber's fine Sonata in G for violin and pianoforte, the interest of which is not diminished by the very obvious influence of Brahms. Miss Dubray's performance of Schumann's "Etudes en forme de variations" showed, perhaps more strikingly than anything else she played, her technical and intellectual powers. The fifth of Mr. Edgar Haddock's Musical Evenings took place on the 13th ult. Dvorák's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in F (Op. 57), played by Miss Sant' Angelo and the Concert-giver, and Chopin's third Scherzo, given with remarkable power and abandon by this clever young lady, were perhaps the best things in the programme. Miss Mabel Chaplin's performance of a movement from one of Davidoff's Violoncello Concertos indicated careful training; the power she at present lacks will doubtless come with increased years. The vocalists were Miss May Pinney, Madame Stone-Barton, and the clever Meister Glee Singers. One of the most interesting programmes the Leeds String Quartet party has yet given was that of their second Concert, which took place on the 21st ult. Beethoven's String Quintet in C (Op. 29) and Brahms's recent String Quintet in G (Op. 111) were enough to give interest to the occasion and were played with much spirit by Messrs. Müller, Fawcett, Gutfeld, Haigh, and Giessing. Miss Clara Thornham was the vocalist.

At Bradford, the fifth and last but one of the Subscription Concerts took place on the 9th ult., and proved one of the most attractive of the series. The programme consisted of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," which was given in its entirety. The soloists were Miss Duma (Senta), Mr. Andrew Black (Vanderdecken), Mr. David Bispham (Daland), Mr. Iver McKay (Erik), and Miss Jessie Moorhouse (Mary). All proved efficient, but special praise is due to Messrs. Black and Bispham, who managed to infuse much character into their parts. In spite of a mishap, for which the singers were apparently not responsible, the great duet between Senta and the Dutchman was very finely sung. The chorus (of the Bradford Festival Choral Society) seemed unfamiliar with the music, and the tenors were quite unable to cope with the difficult chorus in Act III. Sir Charles Hallé's band played many portions of the work admirably, but there were more slips and ragged playing than might have been expected in a work so suited to their powers, and in which they had taken part on two previous occasions within the past half-year. On the 15th ult. Mr. Edward Misdale gave a miscellaneous Concert. The vocalists were Mrs. Frank Moir and Miss E. Lloyd. Mr. Misdale played a portion of Grieg's "Holberg" Suite, and Mr. Frank-Walton was heard in a couple of violoncello solos by Popper.

At Huddersfield, three Subscription Concerts have to be recorded. On January 23 an interesting programme was arranged. Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Carrodus took part in Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30) for pianoforte and violin, besides being heard in several solos, among which Bach's famous Chaconne for violin was prominent. Mr. George Drake, a young violoncellist, also appeared as a soloist and played with refinement if not with much spirit. The vocalists were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Sarah Berry, and Mr. Ben Davies. The programme on the 6th ult. was supplied by Madame Patey's "Farewell" touring party, and was of a nature not calling for detailed criticism. The refined singing of Mrs. Helen Trust and her tasteful choice of songs did much to give a distinction to the programme it might otherwise have lacked. For the rest, Miss Edie Reynolds's finished playing of violin solos and the good singing of Messrs. Hirwen Jones and Norman Salmond deserve mention. Madame Patey's best effort, it should be added, was in the familiar "Lascia ch' io pianga." On the 20th ult. an excellent Orchestral Concert was given by Sir Charles Hallé's band. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the "Anacreon" and "Di Ballo" Overtures of Cherubini and Sullivan were the most striking orchestral pieces. Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a brilliant reading of Saint-Saëns's Second Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and Madame Bertha Moore sang with her usual refinement.

One of the most interesting and least hackneyed Concerts given of late in the West Riding has been that which was given by the Dewsbury Choral Society on January 30. Mr. G. H. Hirst, the Hon. Conductor of the Society, is not content with beaten paths, but generally contrives to give some element of exceptional interest to the programmes for which he is responsible. On this occasion he had persuaded Mr. E. German to visit Dewsbury for the purpose of conducting the very clever and interesting Symphony written by him for the last Norwich Festival. Of this, and of selections from his music to "Henry VIII." and "The Tempter," excellent performances were given by a band of local players. The programme also included Sullivan's "Macbeth" Overture and the perennial "Tannhäuser" Overture. Mr. J. Walton played two movements from one of Goltermann's Violoncello Concertos very ably, and Miss Maggie Davies sang several airs with brilliance and verve.

An excellent Concert was given by the Middlesbrough Musical Union on the 1st ult. Dr. Joachim played Bruch's G minor Concerto with a simple earnestness that was characteristic, and Miss Fanny Davies was heard to advantage in solos by Brahms, Mendelssohn, and Schumann. Both artists took part in Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30). Madame Gomez, the vocalist, charmed the audience by her sympathetic and unaffected style, and the chorus, under Mr. Kilburn's able conductorship, sang Eaton Faning's "Moonlight" and other part-songs with good effect.

A Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given at York, by Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, on January 24. Rubinstein's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in A minor and two pieces by Sgambati were among the most interesting things in the programme, which also included the favourite so-called "Moonlight" Sonata, and violin solos by Gade and Ernst. The smallness of the audience did not redound to the musical credit of the York public. At Wakefield, on the 6th ult., a most interesting Chamber Concert was given. Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in D minor and Gade's Noveletten for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello were the principal things in the programme, and were played with vigour and sympathy by Miss Winifred Robinson (violin), Mr. W. H. Squire (violoncello), and Mr. Albert Fox (pianoforte). Mr. A. Phillips, the vocalist, achieved a marked success by his dramatic singing of Löwe's "Archibald Douglas" and some of Korbay's Hungarian ballads.

Mr. John Dunn, the well-known violinist, gave a Concert at Whitby, on the 8th ult., with the assistance of Mr. Ronchini as violoncellist, and a quartet of vocalists comprising Miss Isidor, Madame Gomez, Messrs. P. Newbury and C. Phillips. The Concert was successful from a financial as well as an artistic point of view, the hall being crowded with an enthusiastic audience.

A new work of considerable interest was performed for the first time on the 5th ult., by the Attercliffe Zion Choral Society. This was a cantata, entitled "Crusader," by Mr. Facer, of Birmingham, at which city the work is to be performed in the Town Hall during the present month. The period of the "book" is 1095-99, and the libretto deals with the Crusades, the Mission of Peter the Hermit forming the groundwork of the story. Mr. Facer has wisely refrained from attempting too much, and has in consequence produced a tuneful and pleasing work. There is considerable originality in most of the numbers, and his choral writing and instrumentation are distinctly effective. A well-written double chorus, in which the composer has ingeniously combined different rhythms, was admirably sung by the fine choir of the Society, and among many successful numbers should be mentioned a melodious chorus of Angels for ladies' voices, a four-part chorus of Turks for tenors and basses, and an orchestral "Crusaders' March." Mr. Facer has been happy in his solo writing. "Hark, the bugle call," a stirring bass solo; a graceful tenor aria, "I gaze upon the land"; and "So long the day," for soprano, are perhaps the most striking; but all are excellent, and the composer is to be congratulated on the care and merit which characterise his work.

Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" was performed by the Attercliffe Christ Church Choral Society on the 6th ult. Mr. W. H. Robinson conducted an excellent chorus, and the work was sung in admirable style. The principals were Miss Marjorie Eaton and Mr. A. N. Tucker. Well executed part-songs by the choir, and ballads concluded the programme.

The Inaugural Concert of the Sheffield and District Press Club was held in the new premises, Beethoven Buildings, on the 3rd ult. The monthly musical gatherings of what is practically the Arts Club of the city have hitherto been very successful, and under the new conditions further developments are promised. The programme included Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, by Messrs. Peck, Webster, and Rodgers; part-songs, glees, &c., by the Parish Church Glee Society, and miscellaneous songs and solos. Among the vocalists was Mr. William Foxon, happily recovered from an illness which at one time threatened his permanent withdrawal from the concert platform.

A Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given on the 1st ult., by Messrs. Geo. and Bromley Booth. The programme included Hans Huber's Suite (Op. 82) for violin and pianoforte. The performers were successful both in combination and as soloists. Miss Eleanor Rees was the vocalist, Mr. Norris accompanying.

The visit of Dr. Joachim and Miss Fanny Davies, on the 13th ult., was a success in every way. The Albert Hall was filled, and the famous violinist was in fine form. Schubert's Phantasie in C major and Tartini's "Il Trillo del Diavolo" were the principal pieces in the first part of the programme. Both were grandly played, and the Doctor was no less successful in a trio of pieces by Schumann and a couple of Hungarian Dances. Miss Davies played solos by Chopin, Brahms, Paderewski, &c. Miss Norledge and Miss Hovey were the vocalists, and Mr. J. W. Phillips accompanied.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Symphony Society of New York, under Mr. Walter Damrosch, followed up the previous successes of the season at the fourth Concert given on January 27, when were performed Schubert's Symphony in C major, Leopold Damrosch's Festival Overture, Reinecke's Concerto for violoncello (Mr. Anton Hegner, soloist), and, with the assistance of Miss Sigrid Wolf, "Le Printemps" and "L'Amour," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Dalila." The orchestra has suffered a serious loss by the withdrawal of Mr. Brodsky, the former Concertmaster, and the unwillingness of the Musical Protective Union to allow Mr. Hegner to play with the other orchestral players, under the narrow and illogical six months' proscriptive clause. Nevertheless, the Symphony received intelligent and smooth interpretation under the reading of Mr. Damrosch, albeit somewhat lacking in warmth of colour and delicacy of shading. Mr. Damrosch has worked assiduously to remedy the defects occasioned by the unfortunate episode which threatened the disruption of his band, and is entitled to warm praise for his resolute artistic purpose under very trying circumstances.

On January 27 the Buffalo Vocal Society, under Mr. Joseph Mischka, assisted by Madame Lilian Blavvelt (soprano) and Miss Leonora von Stosch (violin), gave the first Concert of their ninth season. Notably good numbers were the four-part song (unaccompanied), "The Oak Tree" (Bennett); trio for female voices, "Stars of the summer night" (West); and "Wanderer's night-song" (Wood). The dramatic scene "Liberty" (Eaton Faning), with solo sung by Madame Blavvelt, aroused great enthusiasm, showing in a marked degree the skill of Mr. Mischka as a Conductor, and the intelligent interest on the part of the singers which always leads to such commendable results.

On January 30 the Second Private Concert of the Musurgia, under Mr. Frank Damrosch, was devoted to Folk-song, and was more than usually interesting. Mr. Damrosch is doing eminently good work in his desire to satisfy the demand of our musical public—that music shall be followed not as a mere pastime, but seriously as an essential factor in the artistic culture of the people; and the programme at this Concert was admirably planned along these lines, its performance being in keeping with its design, including such characteristic numbers as "Vermeland" (Swedish national melody), "The Nightingale" (Russian folk-song), "Sally in our Alley," "Annie Laurie," "Old Folks at Home," and "Kathleen Mavourneen." These and kindred selections, sung in a thoroughly musicianlike manner, gave to the large audience an object lesson as to the wonderful beauty and pathos found in these quaint expressions of folk feeling, and doubtless will have the effect of Sam Weller's letter, "they'll wish there was more."

At the first Concert of the Musical Art Society, Mr. Damrosch has arranged for the performance of the Motet "Hæc dies" (Palestrina), "Stabat Mater" (Palestrina), Motet "Sing ye" (J. S. Bach), two six-part songs by Brahms, and a series of madrigals by Henry Leslie and Stafford Smith, thus again leading the tastes of the people into strange, hitherto unknown, but distinctly interesting and instructive lines of musical study. The spirit which prompts this is guided by a fine intelligence and subtle musical insight, which bids fair to make Mr. Damrosch at once a potent influence for good in the near future of music in New York and a social benefactor.

The first service of the Church Choral Society, under Mr. Richard Henry Warren, was marked by the initial performance of the new cantata by Harry Rowe Shelley, "Vexilla Regis," preceded by Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Rheinberger's "Evening Hymn" (chorus à capella). The new work of Mr. Shelley had been awaited with great interest, and was heard by nearly every organist and choirmaster of prominence in the city. The work, as a whole, received adequate interpretation by the Society, although it is much to be regretted that Mr. Warren was unfortunate in the selection of his soloists, especially the bass and tenor, who were manifestly overweighted, and sang their respective parts in a nerveless and vapid way. Miss Hilke, on the other hand, sang the strong and well-written soprano solo "O tree of beauty," in a broad, stately fashion, which brought out fully the great beauty of this admittedly best number; and the chorus, especially in the fifth number, "O Cross, our one reliance, hail!" sang with fine expression and admirable shading. The attack seemed not as certain as we are accustomed to expect from this exceptionally good body of singers, but the quality of tone was irreproachable, and the slight uncertainty was only an incident in an otherwise admirable performance.

The next Concert of this Society will afford an opportunity of hearing Bach's Magnificat and Dvorák's Mass in D, when the singers will no doubt be in their customary form. It is a matter of general regret that the directors of the Church Choral do not see their way to give more than these two Concerts this season, for the character of the work done is, in a way, unique, and supplies a need which seems to lie just between that of the great choral bodies and the more noteworthy church choirs, whose performances are necessarily either of a larger or smaller scope than that undertaken by the Church Choral.

The Boston Handel and Haydn Society gave the second great performance of Mr. Parker's "Hora Novissima," now universally accepted as the best composition written by an American. Mr. Parker conducted, and had the assistance of Miss Emma Juch (soprano), Mrs. H. E. Sawyer (alto), Mr. W. H. Rieger (tenor), and Mr. Max Heinrich (bass); together with Mr. B. J. Lang (organist) and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance, as well as the work itself, aroused great enthusiasm, and the verdict of such critics as Mr. Philip Hale, Mr. Louis C. Elson, &c., is distinctly opposed to that of Madame Nordica, who, at the last moment, refused to sing in it "on account of its inferior character." This latter episode has unhappily given rise to an unseemly interchange of views in correspondence between the composer and the singer, in which neither appears to advantage. It ought to be said, however, that a work which has received the approval of the Church Choral Society of New York, the Handel and Haydn of Boston, and the Cincinnati Festival Association, under so severe a critic as Mr. Theodore Thomas, is not likely to suffer any loss of prestige because of the views of Madame Nordica. If Madame Nordica is right, then Mr. Hale, Mr. Krehbiel, and the whole band of critics must begin their studies over again.

A performance of an unusual character was given at Carnegie Music Hall, by Madame Lineff's Russian Choir. This was "A Russian Peasant Wedding"—a musical folk-drama in two acts, in which, by song and action, were shown the ceremonies attendant upon the betrothal and marriage feast as they obtain among the peasantry of Russia. The ethnological value was considerable, and musically the performance had an unwonted significance as affording opportunity to listen to primitive folk-songs in their simplest form, by a people to whom these songs are the expression of their deepest feelings. This choir was one of the few successful features of the Bureau of Music at Chicago, and now continues its propaganda in the East.

A highly successful Concert was given by the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society and Male-Voice Choir, at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, the 20th ult. As usual, the programme contained novelties, one of them being a Ballad, for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, entitled "The Song of Harold Harfager," the words by Scott, and the music by Mr. John Pointer. The latter is partly modern German and partly modern Slavonic in character, and the piece, in which the solo part was artistically rendered by Mr. H. F. Chamen, is certainly effective. Another piece marked "first time of performance" was an extremely simple little Cradle Song for orchestra, based on a pretty melody by Mr. Santley, and conducted by the composer; Mr. Santley also directed his melodious "Ave Maria," which was sung with expression by Miss Florence Hoskins. The more important works in the programme comprised Beethoven's Symphony in B flat (No. 4), which was extremely well played; Weber's "Oberon" Overture (both of these being conducted by Mr. George Kitchin), and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's picturesque orchestral ballad, "The Ship o' the Fiend," which was given under the composer's personal direction. Mrs. F. Nicholas was heard in Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Giojoso for pianoforte and orchestra, and the male-voice choir contributed part-songs with much refinement.

The admirable selection of music performed at the Comedy Theatre between the acts of Mr. Buchanan's "Dick Sheridan" deserves recognition. It comprises Handel's "Occasional" Overture, Dr. Arne's Overture to "Artaxerxes," a Minuet by Boccherini, the Gavotte, "Temple de la Gloire," and a Rigadoon, "Dardanus," by Rameau; a Minuet and Gavotte by Lully, and an Adagio by Tartini. All these were probably well known at the period in which the play is cast, and all are rendered under the direction of Mr. A. J. Caldicott with an appropriate balance of the parts and a regard to the traditional manner of performance that impart antiquarian interest to the performance, and happily serves to preserve the atmosphere of the days of our forefathers which the play so cleverly suggests. Another realistic touch is given by the music to a gavotte danced in the first act being played by two violinists in costume on the stage, instead of, as usual, by the full orchestra. It is curiously suggestive of the longevity of rhythmic and tuneful music to hear the foot beating which accompanies Rameau's Rigadoon. The music to "Here's to the Maiden," sung at the opening of the second act, was composed by Linley to Sheridan's words. It will be remembered that Sheridan married the celebrated singer, Miss Linley, daughter of the composer.

A large number of ladies and gentlemen—all, with a few professional exceptions, members of our chief amateur orchestral societies—gave their services, on the 14th ult., at a Concert organised by Mr. Randegger at the Imperial Institute, the object of which, it is understood, was to inaugurate the establishment there of a permanent orchestral and choral society. The performance generally was of high excellence, Haydn's Symphony in G (No. 13) being played (especially as regards the slow movement) with a degree of breadth and artistic finish rarely exceeded even by the best professional orchestras. Nicolai's "Merry Wives" Overture and some lighter pieces were also given with admirable results. That rising young artist, Miss Beatrice Langley, grappled bravely with the difficulties of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and achieved a measure of success that was plainly indicated in the hearty applause which followed her sympathetic and intelligent rendering of this beautiful work. Songs were very acceptably contributed by Miss Lena Seymour, who, at short notice, took the place of Miss Nellie Rowe. If this Concert may be regarded as an earnest of things to come, Mr. Randegger may be congratulated d'avance with perfect safety.

On the 1st ult. an opera, entitled "The Magic Fountain," written by Mr. J. R. J. Johnstone, composed by Mr. Harold S. Moore, was produced at St. George's Hall. Mr. Moore has not yet emerged from his student days—he is at present a pupil of Mr. Ebenezer Prout—and it would therefore be manifestly unfair to judge his work by too lofty a standard; but even when due allowance is made for this, as well as for the fact that "The Magic Fountain" was composed before he had placed himself in the hands of his distinguished professor, it would be rash, if not absolutely untrue, to say that there are any signs in his score that Mr. Moore has in him the stuff of which operatic composers are made. He can write pleasant melody, and scores not ungracefully, but of the dramatic sense he seems quite destitute. No one with the smallest aptitude for the stage would have chosen a libretto so ludicrously bad. It is, however, quite possible that in less ambitious ways Mr. Moore might appear to better advantage. It was asserted that the performance was given simply in order that the young composer might learn from the critics whether, in their opinion, he has sufficient ability to justify him in the prosecution of musical studies; on which we feel compelled to ask why he could not allow Mr. Prout to settle the matter for him.

The West London Choral Society gave, on the 13th ult., a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," at Craven Chapel, Foubert's Place, Regent Street. The choir is, as a whole, a capable body of voices, but it might be better balanced. The singing was more remarkable for dash and energy than finish or refinement; in consequence, some of the dramatic choruses went better than those in which the higher qualities of choral singing are demanded. Crispness of attack and release, distinct declamation, and greater attention to dynamic nuances will have to be carefully studied by the members of the Society if they wish to attain a good position amongst metropolitan choirs, such as with further practice should be within their reach. Of the soloists, Mr. Thomas Abel deserves commendation for a tuneful and unaffected performance of the title part. The tenor, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, gained much applause. Miss Florence Landergan and Miss Lilian Close were the soprano and contralto, Mr. Albert Wood did good service at the organ, and Mr. William Holmes conducted with energy.

Mr. Joseph Ivimey is doing excellent work at Surbiton in affording the residents continued opportunities of hearing music of the highest order at his Popular Chamber Concerts, given on alternate Saturday afternoons at the Assembly Rooms. The series is now in its fifth season, and the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth Concerts were given on the 3rd and 17th ult. On the first date Schubert's Trio in E flat (Op. 100) and Gade's Trio in F (Op. 42) were included, besides violin and pianoforte solos by Mendelssohn and Schumann. The vocalist at this Concert was Madame Clara Samuell. On the 17th, the programme contained Beethoven's String Quartet in F (Op. 18, No. 1), Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor (Op. 49), and Handel's Violin Sonata in A. The vocalist was Madame Alice Gomez. The instrumentalists who took part in these Concerts were Mr. Joseph Ivimey and Mr. A. Slocombe (violin), Mr. Alfred Hobday (viola), Mr. Arthur Blagrove (violoncello), and Mr. John W. Ivimey (pianoforte). Mr. Ivimey deserves success; let us hope he commands it.

An admirable performance of that most dramatic and picturesque of secular cantatas, Dvorák's "The Spectre's Bride," was given by the Highbury Philharmonic Society on the 5th ult., at the Highbury Athenæum. The choir of North London amateurs sang the difficult music with fine tone and infinite spirit, and Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who conducted with much intelligence, had also ample reason for satisfaction with the treatment accorded to the picturesque accompaniments by his orchestra, which consists, in the main, of amateurs. The solos were rendered with unvarying artistic feeling, if at times with insufficient power, by Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Eugène Oudin. Mr. Hamish MacCunn's vigorous and original Overture "Land of the Mountain and the Flood," and Mr. Eaton Faning's choral ballad "The Miller's wooing" were included in the second part of a highly successful Concert, which, in spite of deplorable weather, was very well attended.

The Annual General Meeting of the "Choir Benevolent Fund" was held at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 6th ult., when a very satisfactory report and balance-sheet were presented. The quinquennial valuation report of the actuary, Mr. Adler, was also read, and proved the society to be in a most flourishing condition, in consequence of which new rules were passed to enable the committee to pay a larger sum than had hitherto been paid at the death of any member who has been in the society for thirty-five years or upwards. The report of the committee alluded to the loss the society had sustained by the death of Sir George Elvey; and subsequently his successor at St. George's Chapel, Windsor—Sir Walter Parratt—was elected to fill his place on the committee. Two other new members of that body were also elected—namely, Mr. Sutton Shepley, of the Chapels Royal, and Mr. Ernest Marriott, of St. Paul's Cathedral.

Mr. Leonard Borwick, for his Pianoforte Recital at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 10th ult., drew material ranging in point of production from Bach to Paderewski. If a demand for repetition so pronounced as to render refusal almost impossible be an unmistakable indication of success, the honours of the afternoon were awarded to the living composer's "Humoresque de Concert" (genre Scarlatti); but prior to this Mr. Borwick had given a feeling and impressive rendering of Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), besides felicitously reproducing the spirit of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" (Op. 13), of Preludes by Bach and Mendelssohn respectively, of Saint-Saëns's Caprice upon the ballet airs in Gluck's "Alceste," and of a Romance by Brahms. Later came specimens of Rubinstein and Liszt. Throughout Mr. Borwick played with an unfailing care and conscientiousness that commanded the hearty approval of a large assemblage.

The fifth of the Hampstead Popular Concerts of Chamber Music for the season, held on the 9th ult., at the Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, had among its leading attractions Professor Stanford's new String Quartet in A minor, which was rendered with the utmost effect by Messrs. Richard Gompertz, Haydn Inwards, Emil Kreuz, and Charles Ould. The ability of Miss Ilona Eibenschutz was conclusively demonstrated by her performance of Chopin's Nocturne in C sharp minor (Op. 27) and Scherzo in B minor and of the pianoforte portion of Schumann's Sonata in D minor (Op. 121). The remaining instrumental piece was Brahms's Quartet for pianoforte and strings in G minor (Op. 25). Mrs. Hutchinson gave, with her wonted taste and to the delight of a large audience, songs by Brahms, Wagner, and Mdlle. Chaminade, the accompaniments to which were well played by Mr. Henry Bird.

The West Hampstead Choral and Orchestral Society gave its first Concert of the season on the 1st ult., at the West Hampstead Town Hall, when Mendelssohn's "Christus" and Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" were performed. The soloists were Madame Barter, who undertook the work at a few hours' notice; Miss Maude Barker, Messrs. Edwin Bryant, Percy Webster, and Arthur Wills, all of whom rendered valuable assistance. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Mr. C. W. Evans (a pupil of Mr. Edward Croager) played Chopin's Prelude in D flat and Mendelssohn's Etude in B flat minor; Miss Adela Drayton recited a scene from "The Hunchback," and the Concert concluded with Charles Wood's clever setting of "Full fathom five" and Eaton Faning's "The Miller's wooing." The performance was conducted by Mr. Edward G. Croager.

Bach's "Passion" according to St. John is again to be heard each Friday evening during Lent at St. Anne's, Soho. Mr. E. H. Thorne, the Organist of the Church, of course presides at the instrument of which he is such a master; the ordinary choir has been strengthened, and there is a numerous orchestra. The chief solo parts, on the 9th ult., when the work was reproduced for the season, were taken by Messrs. Rimington, J. Horncastle, T. Sweeney, and F. Habbijam. The choruses were on the whole well rendered, particularly those so powerfully echoing the clamour of the multitude; whilst the interspersed chorales received the vocal support of the congregation, according to Bach's desire at the outset. Alike from the religious and the musical standpoint these Lenten performances of the St. John Passion are of distinct value.

By kind permission of Mrs. John Hullah, Mr. Abdy Williams lectured, on the 13th ult., at Brittany Lodge, Kensington, upon "The Revival of Ancient Plainsong." The lecturer gave an admirable epitome of the history of plainsong, and showed by means of diagrams the gradual conversion of accent marks into neumes, and these into notes. The effect of the introduction of counterpoint, which ultimately reduced the plainsong into a dead level of equal notes, sung to the text "without accent and without rhythm," was also clearly shown; and the successful investigations of the Benedictine monks of Solesmes, for the revival of the ancient method of chanting, described. A number of examples of syllabic and melismatic plainsong were sung by four members of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society, under the direction of the lecturer.

The Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music held the preliminary examinations of candidates at 107 centres throughout Great Britain and Ireland on the 21st ult. These examinations were, with few exceptions, held in buildings the use of which was granted by the universities and municipal authorities throughout the country. In London, by the kindness of the Lord Mayor and the Corporation and the Committee of the City of London School, the large concert hall, and several class-rooms in the school on the Victoria Embankment were made available for the purpose. The number of London candidates examined was 425 in all. There were present on behalf of the Board Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Threlfall, Mr. Charles Morley, Sir G. Grove, and Mr George Watson (secretary).

It is not usual to notice Dramatic Recitals in a purely musical journal, but at that given by Miss Mabel Harrison and Mr. Ernest Meads at Princes' Hall, on the 15th ult, the admirable and refined singing of Miss Mary Willis (accompanied by her sister) in Cooke's "Over hill, over dale"—introduced in the Shakespearian part of the programme—and Madame Pauline Viardot's adaptation of Chopin's Mazurka deserves recognition. Miss Willis is a vocalist who should be more frequently heard. Miss Harrison is a very refined elocutionist although somewhat lacking in power, and Mr. Meads adds to a good presence a manly style and good method of elocution which, in the more vigorous parts of the programme, were heard to great advantage. Mr. Albert Fox, as solo pianist, played "Les etoiles filantes," of Mattei, and two of his own compositions successfully.

The concertina cannot be said to be greatly esteemed by the majority of music-lovers, but those who heard Miss Edith Drake's performances on an elaborated development of this instrument called the Æola, on the 14th ult., at Princes' Hall, cannot fail to have been impressed with the skill and artistic taste of the player, and the many charming effects produced. How much Miss Drake's playing was appreciated may be gathered from the fact that her audience exacted just twice as many pieces as the programme announced her to give. Other artists who contributed to the enjoyment of the evening were Mdlle. Recoschewitz, Mr. and Mrs. van Lennep, Miss Hulme, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. P. Mahlendorff, the Fisher-Farkoa duettists, Mr. Leo Stern, and Miss E. Meadows.

It is proposed to give at Queen's Hall, during the ensuing spring, a series of twelve Concerts (nine orchestral and three choral), at more popular prices than has hitherto been attempted in London. The programmes of the Orchestral Concerts will include the standard and modern symphonies, concertos, &c., together with lighter works, and will be varied by vocal excerpts rendered by the best available artists. At the Choral Concerts it is proposed to perform Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Cowen's "Water Lily," and another work not yet decided on. The orchestra will be selected from the best instrumentalists of the Philharmonic Society and the Italian Opera, and will number eighty performers, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen.

Mr. C. Emlyn Jones was able to secure the services of several artists of the same nationality as himself for his Concert at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 15th ult. At the Wrexham Eisteddfod six years ago, Mr. Emlyn Jones won the tenor solo prize, and since his course of study at the Royal Academy of Music he has successfully appeared on metropolitan and provincial platforms and in light comic opera. Mr. Frederic Griffith, Miss Llewela Davies, Miss Marion Evans, Madame Emlyn Jones, Miss Mary Jenkins, and others assisted in the entertainment.

At the 300th monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union given at Pimlico Rooms on the 2nd ult., the principal feature of attraction was Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," supplemented by miscellaneous pieces. The choruses were admirably sung under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, the able Conductor of the Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Maud Bond, Miss Ada Tomlinson, Mr. W. Fell, and Mr. W. H. Webb. Mr. F. R. Kinkee and Mr. Charles F. Reddie (who also played Chopin's Polonaise in E flat) accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. J. H. Maunder on the harmonium. A part-song by the last-named artist, entitled "Thor's War Song," was very successful.

A Concert was given on the 1st ult., at Avondale Hall, Clapham, in aid of the Restoration Fund of St. Mary's Church, Clapham. The programme indicated the high artistic aim of the promoters, and included Mozart's Trio (No. 5 in G major) and Haydn's Trio (No. 1 in G major), played by Miss M. Moss (pianoforte), Miss E. Barns (violin), and Dr. Needham (violoncello)—Mrs. Needham replacing Miss Moss in the second Trio. Mr. W. Webster contributed three songs by F. Korbay, and Mr. Arthur Oswald gave a very sympathetic rendering of two songs by Mrs. Needham (accompanied by the composer). The other vocalists who assisted were Miss Marie Stiven, Miss Katie Thomas, and Mr. James Horncastle.

The Tulse Hill Glee Society gave a very enjoyable Concert on January 25, when Bridge's "Inchcape Rock" and other pieces were rendered in a praiseworthy manner. Miss A. Marie Holloway was solo violinist, and was heartily encored in each of her solos. A duet for two pianofortes (Fantasia in G minor, by Mr. Fred. W. Holloway) was played by the composer and his sister, and gained an enthusiastic encore. The other artists were Mr. Percy Shinn (solo violoncellist), Madame Robiolio, and Mr. Robert Poole. The programme throughout was classical, and Mr. Holloway is to be congratulated on his successful efforts as composer, pianist, and conductor.

A Concert was given by the Ravenscourt Choral Society, at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on January 25, when Gaul's "Una" was performed with success. The first part of the programme consisted of songs and ballads. Miss Annie Swinfen, Miss Cecilia Comyns, Messrs. Maskell Hardy and Arthur Strugnell were the vocalists, and Mr. T. J. Milne played two solos on the violin. The second part of the programme commenced with "Una." The choir showed the excellent training it had received from the Conductor, Mr. Frank Braine; the chorus, "O lady, have no timid fear," deserving special mention. Mrs. Carver accompanied.

On the 6th ult. the St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley, gave the second Concert of the present season, when the works performed under Dr. C. J. Frost's direction were Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" and Sir G. A. Macfarren's "Outward Bound." The principals were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Sutton Shepley, with Mr. J. Curran and Mr. A. J. Sindall as accompanists. The choir appeared to great advantage in Bennett's popular work, though the audience apparently appreciated more the nautical character of "Outward Bound."

An interesting Historical Lecture-Recital was given by Miss Beatrice Hallett on January 30, at the High School, Graham Street, Sloane Square. The lecturer showed the development of pianoforte music from Bach to Brahms, and played successfully her own illustrations, including Bach's Suite (No. 5), part of Haydn's Sonata in E flat, Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, one of Schubert's Moments Musical, one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," two of Chopin's Studies, Schumann's Scenes from Childhood, and Brahms's Hungarian Dance and Volkslied.

A most successful Pianoforte Recital was given at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on the 10th ult., by Mr. Tobias A. Matthay, assisted by Miss Winifred Robinson, Mr. Ben Grove, and Miss Emily Christie. The programme included works by Schumann, Chopin, Gounod, Rubinstein, Alkan, Franz Ries, the Concert-giver, and others. The audience was large, and lavish in demonstrations of approval.

A special Service was held at St. James's, Paddington, on Sunday afternoon, the 18th ult., when a large selection from "The Messiah" was given by a special choir (numbering ninety voices), under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Attersoll, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist of the Church, presiding at the organ. The solos were admirably rendered by Miss Gertrude Izard, Miss Florence Brook, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Frederick Winton. It is hoped that these special services will be continued on the second Sunday in each month.

Madame Florence Winn gave a Concert at West Hampstead Town Hall, on the 8th ult., in aid of the Railway Servants' Benevolent Fund. Madame Winn, whose songs were received with great favour, was assisted by Madame Adeline Paget, Misses Ethel Winn, Beatrice Gough, Agnes Wilson, Mrs. Osborne Williams; Messrs. John Bartlett, O'Shaugnessy, Henry Baker, Charles Loder, Roger Hilton, Bantock Pierpoint, the Polymnia Quartet, Miss Kate Chaplin (solo violin), Miss Edith Drake (solo æola), Mr. Walter Churcher, and Mr. Charles Fry.

A farewell Dinner was given to Dr. G. F. Huntley, prior to his departure for Newcastle Cathedral, by the Choir of St. Andrew's, Ashley Place, on the 19th ult., at the Holborn Restaurant. Mr. C. A. Dungate, in proposing Dr. Huntley's health, referred to the able services he had rendered during his tenure of office as Organist to the Church. After the dinner a most enjoyable programme was given by members of the choir; Mr. Hubert Hunt, of St. Jude's, South Kensington, playing some violin solos with much success. Mr. F. R. Barkway was in the chair.

"Lazarus of Bethany," a new Oratorio by George Shinn, was performed under the direction of the composer at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on January 31. The solo parts were sung by Madame L. Jarratt, Miss West, Miss E. Bloxham, Mr. Edwin Smith, and Mr. R. Poole. The choruses were sung by a choir of eighty voices, including twenty ladies. Mr. Baines presided at the organ, Mr. F. G. Shinn at the pianoforte; trumpet, Mr. Pratt; trombone, Mr. Overton.

Herr Korbay, the composer of Hungarian folk-songs, has accepted a professorship of singing at the Royal Academy of Music, and will take up his position at the commencement of the midsummer term. Madame Agnes Larkcom has also been appointed a professor of singing. Two new prizes are instituted during the current term—one by Mr. Norman Salmond for vocalists who are natives of Yorkshire, and the other by Miss Agnes Zimmermann for pianists, the latter with a special view to the encouragement of sight reading.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah," on Wednesday, January 31, at St. Bride's, Fleet Street. The soloists were Miss Beatrice Gough, Miss Amy Carter, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Blackney. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ. "The Messiah" was given, on the 14th ult., at Holy Trinity, Dalston. The soloists were Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Henry Baker.

Mr. Freeman Whatmoor gave a Pianoforte Recital at Oakley Place Chapel, Camberwell, on January 27. His programme included Haydn's Symphony (No. 13), as a duet with Miss A. Whatmoor; the Finale of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, the "Spinnerlied" (Wagner), arranged by Liszt, and several compositions by the performer himself. Madame Merton Clark and Mr. H. T. Sims were the vocalists, and Mr. H. Coe played some violin solos.

On Wednesday evening, January 24, a selection from "St. Paul" was rendered by the choir of Christ Church, Turnham Green, and was repeated on the following Sunday. On Sunday evening, the 4th ult., Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was sung with orchestral accompaniment; Miss Agnes Fowler sustained the solo part, Master S. W. Toms was at the organ, and Mr. W. R. B. Tann again conducted.

The Lecture at the Royal Academy of Music, on the 28th ult., was to be given by Professor Bridge, on "Early Dramatic Music" (from the Miracle Plays to the "Masque of Comus"), and that on the 7th inst., also by Professor Bridge, will be a complete explanation of teaching music by "Musical Gestures." The choristers of Westminster Abbey will assist.

Sir John Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was performed at All Souls' Church, Grosvenor Park, Camberwell, on the 13th ult. The soloists were Miss Rose Moss, Mr. Liney O. Dalby, and Mr. W. A. Preston. Mr. Wm. Rayment Kirby presided at the organ, and Mr. C. Hastings Kirby, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, conducted.

A series of monthly free Organ Recitals is being given at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars. At the fifth of these, on the 15th ult., the programme played by Mr. Rudolph Loman included Handel's Concerto in B flat, A. G. Ritter's Sonata in E minor (Op. 35), and pieces by Mendelssohn, Guilmant, and Schumann.

The annual meeting of the Benevolent Fund of the late Sacred Harmonic Society was held on January 30, the President, Mr. E. H. Mannering, in the chair. We are asked to state that information respecting the Fund may be had on application to the Hon. Sec., Mr. W. J. Bishop, 70, Highbury Hill.

Mr. Andrew Deakin, of Birmingham, is, we learn, engaged in the task of elaborating his "Musical Bibliography," and now has a list of 6,000 musical works printed in England before 1800. Of these only 3,500 have accurate dates.

Herr von Bandrowski, the principal tenor of the Grand Opera at Frankfort, will make his first appearance in England at the Royal Society's performance of Gounod's "Requiem" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," at the Royal Albert Hall, to-night.

We omitted to state in our last issue that the translation of the Reminiscences of Grieg quoted from the Dagbladet, which appeared in that number, was supplied by Mr. Osman Edwards.

Mr. Charles Lawrence, on resigning the post of Organist and Choirmaster of St. Alban's, Streatham Park, was presented, on the 15th ult., with a purse containing £45 10s.

REVIEWS.

A Plain and Easy Introduction to Music; or, the new "Morley." By Frederick Corder. [Forsyth Brothers.]

Concealment of the profitable powder in a spoonful of alluring jam has long been known to nurses as the wisest way. Pedagogues have shown less insight. They, with rare exceptions, have taken care that as little pleasure as possible should accompany the acquirement of knowledge. In the popular mind, much learning is associated with solemnity of face and manner; but the thoughtful know well enough that it is possible to be dull without being deep—and deep without being dull. The result is a gradual recognition of the fact that knowledge may be imparted pleasantly, not only without loss to itself, but with immeasurable gain to the happiness both of teacher and taught. Among those who have worthily contributed to smooth the paths of knowledge, and enliven the journey along them, must now be placed Mr. Corder, who, by means of this little volume, has given us, in most unconventional and humorous language, a large amount of information—much of which is of a kind not to be found at all in printed form. Though called an "Introduction to Music" (in imitation of its famous sixteenth century exemplar), the booklet—there are but eighty pages—is really an introduction to composition; for though the preliminaries of music are dealt with, so also are the essentials of "form," the arts of writing accompaniments, of harmonising a tune, and even of composing one, and the laws of part-writing—and that with a freshness and a knowledge of practical needs that, perhaps, can be thoroughly appreciated only by one who has "gone through the mill." The form adopted is, of course, that of the dialogue—the characters consisting of The Professor, He, She, and It. The volume is chiefly devoted to the education of He and She, who are amateurs.

It disappears early, as the following extract shows:—

"Prof.: To what am I indebted for the honour of this visit?

"It: We have heard of your reputation as a teacher, sir, and desire to become your pupils in all that appertains to the art of music. My friends are merely amateurs, but I myself am desirous of making music my profession.

"Prof.: If that is the case I can quickly dispose of you. Seeing your age I assume that you have a certain acquaintance with the compositions of the great masters. . . . Therefore you may take up Stainer's Primer or Banister's 'Music' and work through them with but a moderate assistance from me, and afterwards go on to Macfarren or Prout's more elaborate grammars.

"It: And what good will these do me?

"Prof.: They will teach you the general principles to be deduced from the practice of all great musicians. Then, if you have sufficient intelligence to apply the principles and formulæ which you have learnt to the music which you know, you will find that you, too, have become a musician. If you haven't, you won't. Good morning."

Here is a specimen of the author's luminous style: "A 'higher form of art' is really a higher art of form, for it consists in constructing tunes which shall be satisfying as such to the ear, but whose component phrases shall not be so vulgarly symmetrical. . . . Naturally, to clamp together several distinct melodic phrases so that they will seem to cohere requires considerable instinct and even judgment. Schubert's 'Ave Maria' is such a melody, Handel's 'Largo' another, Mendelssohn's 'O rest in the Lord' another."

He and She are then shown how "tunes may be made a little less square and yet remain tunes." At the end of the book the Professor dismisses his pupils, saying to She: "You have not the makings of a genuine musician in you, but I have taught you enough to enable you to amuse yourself and earn a fortune by writing vile ballads.

"She (much offended): Good morning, Professor. [Exit.

"He: Good-bye, Professor, you have really helped me by putting things into plain English instead of muddling me with those awful technical terms. I think I shall study seriously after this. [Exit.

"Prof. (looking from window): Humph! She is waiting for him at the corner of the street. Thank Heaven we shall be spared the threatened ballads! But with this inducement to seek name and fame I suppose by this time next year I shall be helping him with his degree cantata. Dear, dear! what a world it is."

Compositions by René Lenormand: (1) Melodies Tristes pour voix et piano; (2) Nouvelles Esquisses pour piano seul; (3) Six Morceaux pour piano à 4 mains.

[Paris: J. Hamelle.]

Mr. Lenormand's name is, if we mistake not, almost unknown in England. His music, however, is much appreciated in Paris, among those, at least, who still regard earnestness and sincerity as musical virtues. Not that Mr. Lenormand makes these a reason for writing ugly music—quite the reverse; but he reveals greater depth of feeling than is usual with the majority of French writers, and his harmony is fuller and his rhythms more vigorous than theirs. Among other conspicuous qualities may be named unpretentiousness; restraint, with its resulting impression of underlying power; melody of an unconventional type; and that lucidity which seems to be the birthright of every Frenchman. The "Melodies tristes" are four songs of which both words and music are of a very high order of merit, but the half-fledged amateur is hereby warned that they are not for him. The accompaniments, however, are not difficult.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 194—197.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Organists are so well acquainted with the meritorious qualities which distinguish the works of Mr. Otto Dienel that no words of preface are necessary in introducing to their notice the present compositions from his facile pen. The first of the four is entitled "Third Concert Fantasia," and consists of a broadly written Allegro maestoso in D, in phraseology so clear that it might almost be signed by Mozart, while one theme distinctly recalls the Finale of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Though styled a Fantasia the piece is sufficiently symmetrical to pass for the first movement of a Sonata. No. 195 is an Allegretto cantabile in G, 6-8 time, written in a pastoral style, evidently for the soft stops, though the registering is left to the discretion of the player. The next is an Andante with Variations in the same key, cleverly written but by no means elaborate, and quite within the means of ordinarily competent players. No. 197 is an Allegro Scherzando in F, a bright and vivacious piece, not perhaps suitable as a church voluntary, but certain to prove effective in a recital programme.

Short Anthems. Nos. 47, 48, 49, and 50.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first and second of these are by John White. "Have mercy upon me, O God," is a setting of two verses from the 51st Psalm, and is intended for Lent. A brief solo for soprano or tenor leads into an equally brief chorus, both being noteworthy for extreme simplicity in harmony and part-writing. The other is a setting of the "Ave Verum" with the original Latin words and an English translation. Treble and alto soloists may be employed, but not of necessity, and the anthem is very easy, devotional, and expressive. "Shew me Thy ways, O God," by J. Varley Roberts, is rather longer and slightly more elaborate than the foregoing, but generally placid in style, and perhaps may recall to some hearers Attwood's popular anthem "Turn Thy face from my sins," though there is no direct plagiarism. It is written for tenor solo and ordinary four-part chorus. The last for the present is "The Lord opened the doors of Heaven," by F. Cunningham Woods. This is described as an Introit, and is a very effective little composition at once bright and energetic.

Dulce Domum. Rhymes and Songs (old and new) for Children. Edited by John Farmer.

[Cassell and Co., Limited.]

This attractive volume should contribute largely to the increase of concord in the nursery. It includes such "evergreens" as "Little Bo-Peep," "Sing a Song of Sixpence," "Polly put the kettle on," "Over the hills and far away," and "Hey diddle diddle," to name but five out of the eighty-two contained in the first half of the book. These and their seventy-seven companions are specially identified with "childhood's happy hour"; but the songs which, to the number of half-a-hundred, form the second portion, appeal to a larger audience. To furnish these, the national treasury of song of the last three centuries has been laid under contribution. Each of the songs in the book has an appropriate, and therefore simple, pianoforte accompaniment, of which the highest part moves in unison with the vocal melody. Paper and print are good and clear.

Lyric Pieces for Pianoforte. By Edward Grieg. Book VI. (Op. 57). [Leipzig: Peters.]

These pieces are a valuable addition to our store of short pieces needing, in those who play them, taste, poetic feeling, and intelligence rather than great executive facility. They are six in number, entitled respectively: "Menuet," "Gade," "Illusion," "Secret," "She dances," and "Home sickness." The grace, piquancy, harmonic variety, and rhythmic charm so conspicuous in previous works of this gifted composer, abound also here. Of the grotesque, the boisterous, the bizarre side of Grieg's wayward muse, however, this time nothing is seen. As regards poetic interest or expressive significance, "Home sickness" appears to us to be first in order of merit; "Secret" and "Illusion" next. For grace and fancy, "Menuet" and "She dances" easily bear away the palm; the former—rather a Mazurka than a Minuet, by the way, though that signifies little—being, moreover, very striking and original. We have said enough to ensure Grieg's Op. 57 a welcome amongst all who in music prefer feeling to fireworks.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Berlin.—Leoncavallo's "I Medici" was given, for the first time in Germany, at the Royal Opera, on the 17th ult., and enthusiastically received, the composer being called no less than fourteen times. The Emperor and Empress were present at the performance and, afterwards, invited the poet-musician to the Castle.

Brescia.—A new opera by Gaetano Coronaro, entitled "Malacarne," was produced on January 20, at the Grand Theatre. Its success was apparently very considerable.

Brussels.—Alfred Bruneau's new opera, "L'Attaque du Moulin," was given for the first time at the Théâtre de le Monnaie, on January 27, and achieved a genuine success. M. Seguin was admirable in the sympathetic part of the miller, Merlier.

Carlsruhe.—Tschaikowsky's one-act opera "Iolanthe" was performed at the Court Theatre, on January 27, for the first time, and very warmly received.

Cologne.—At the seventh Gürzenich Concert, on January 23, a new Symphony in B flat, by Gustav Jensen, was produced with much success, and Herr Albert Eibenschütz played Rubinstein's fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.

Copenhagen.—"Cleopatra," the new four-act opera by August Enna, was produced at the Court Theatre, on the 7th ult., with fair success. The music is said to contain many reminiscences of Wagner and Verdi.

Darmstadt. — At the Court Theatre a new one-act opera, "Der Brautgang," by Bruno Oelsner, a member of the Court Orchestra, was successfully produced on January 21.

Dresden.—"Marga" is the title of a new one-act opera which was, on the 9th ult., successfully produced at the Court Theatre. The composer is Herr Pittrich.

Leipzig. — At the sixteenth Gewandhaus Concert, on the 2nd ult., three short movements from Edvard Grieg's music to Björnson's drama, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," were produced under the direction of the composer, and enthusiastically received. They are entitled: Vorspiel, "In the hall of the king"; Intermezzo, "Borghild's Dream"; and "Huldigungsmarsch."——Giacomo Puccini's lyric drama "Manon Lescaut" was performed, for the first time, at the new Town Theatre, on the 2nd ult.——On the 3rd ult. the Teachers' Choral Society gave its second Concert, when an exceptionally interesting programme was put forth. The choir sang Edgar Tinel's à capella setting of the 29th Psalm, Schubert's magnificent "Gesang der Geister über den Wassern," two sixteenth century songs by Lechner and Hesler, and Brahms's rarely heard cantata "Rinaldo." A young English violoncellist, Miss Mary Taylor, of Oxford, a pupil of Julius Klengel, met with great success in Goltermann's A minor Concerto and several smaller pieces.

Liège.— The hundredth performance of Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," at the Théâtre Royal, was given on January 28, in the presence of the veteran composer. He was received by the Governor of the province of Liège, the Burgomaster, and the director of the Conservatoire; a local choral society sang the "Marseillaise," and the audience rose from their seats and greeted the master with prolonged cheers and shouts of welcome as he entered the royal box in the gaily decorated building.

Lisbon.—At the Avenida Theatre, a comic opera, "A Mulher de pastelleiro," by Cyriaco de Cardoso, was recently produced with success.

Milan.—Wagner's "Walküre" was given a dozen times during the month of January, and always to crowded and interested audiences, so that the non-success of the first performance was evidently not fatal to the chances of the work on the foremost Italian stage.

Naples.—A parody on Verdi's "Falstaff," entitled "Falsa-staff," the music by G. Marchisio, has made its appearance at one of the smaller theatres here.

Prague.—On the 7th ult., Wagner's "Meistersinger" was performed for the first time in the vernacular at the Bohemian National Theatre and enthusiastically received.

Paris.—"Le Flibustier," a comédie lyrique in three acts, by the Russian General and Composer, César Cui, was performed for the first time at the Opéra Comique, on January 22, but met with only the barest succès d'estime. ——M. Léon Boëllmann has been awarded the prize of 1,000 francs, offered by the Société des Compositeurs de Musique, for the best Symphony for great orchestra, while a prize of 500 francs for the best Pianoforte Quartet was carried off by M. F. de la Tombelle.

Savona.—"Il Conte di Salto" is the title of a new one-act opera successfully produced at the Chiabrera Theatre, on January 21. The composer is Signor Giovanni Consolini.

St. Petersburg.—Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci," with Madame Sembrich in the character of Nedda, was performed for the first time, and with great success, at the Italian Opera, on January 22.——A new String Quintet in A, by Alexandre Glazounow, was recently produced with very great success at the fifth Auer-Verjbilowitch Chamber Concert.——The projected Wagner Cycle by the troupe of the Hamburg Opera has been abandoned, because subscribers were not forthcoming in sufficient numbers. The success of the French opera season, on the other hand, is secured, all seats having already been booked. "C'est un beau succès," quoth the Paris Ménestrel.

Stuttgart.—On January 21 a new romantic opera, "Der Pfeifer von Hardt," the libretto after Hauff's novel "Lichtenstein," the music by Ferdinand Langer, was produced at the Court Theatre and pleased very much.

Vienna.—Richard Heuberger's new three-act opera "Mirjam," or "Das Maifest," was produced at the Court Opera, on January 20, with considerable success. The music is very taking, but the libretto uninteresting.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ART OF CHANTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In continuation of the remarks for which you kindly granted me space last month, may I take up certain points which were then left without sufficient notice?

Conceding, as everyone must, that the harmonised Anglican Chant, whatever its merits or defects, has been gradually built up out of primitive melodic and rhythmic forms, to meet felt necessities, the problem we have to solve as best we can is how to adapt to this chant, moulded as we have it, the English Version of the Psalms. The true arsis and thesis of the Anglican Chant is ascertained and settled, and we must take it as it stands, although it might be contended, in spite of the customary method of barring, that the underlying rhythm is more accurately indicated by the quadruple grouping of the phrases, as probably those find out who try to set the words to the music. Let us not, however, claim too much for any known form of chant. Constant concession and compromise are demanded. Difficult and doubtful places have to be considered with care and handled with judgment. And, when all is done, lack of intelligent appreciation and musical skill may nullify the most expressive arrangement of the words.

After many experiments which might well be called wild, most church musicians appear to be agreed that after all the time-honoured syllabic system of pointing, freely modified according to circumstances, is the most satisfactory, or at least offers the fewest objections and drawbacks. Not that any system is automatically perfect, calling upon the organist and the choir for nothing but a placid, unobservant, inexpressive jog-trot. Delicate tact and nice discrimination are required, in order to bring out by the pointing the meaning and teaching of the words, without infringing needlessly upon the syllabic principle; and on the part of the executants also are required watchfulness and quickness, to strengthen or weaken an accent here, to pass circumspectly over an awkward passage there, and, above all, to sing and play with understanding, reverence, and propriety of expression. I notice that Mr. Heywood claims for the particular type of chant he favours a virtual monopoly of the opportunity of giving proper expression; but where is the impossibility of singing expressively when the ordinary Anglican Chant is used? Begging the question is not serious argument.

I should like to say something about the treatment of the words which stand at the ends of the 1,376 verses, which Mr. Heywood separates off from the other 1,132 in the Psalter, as lending themselves more readily to the method of pointing he prefers. Say and do what we will, the final accent asserts itself in any recognised form of chant. The crux is how to deal with words of two, three, or four syllables, of which the last is unaccented in English. Affixes of quality or state of being, as "ness" or "ion," and tense-endings, as "eth" or "ed," surely cannot properly be assigned to the final note of the chant, except under the pressure of absolute necessity. It would appear, however, that Mr. Heywood (see p. 35 of his book) contemplates being constrained to leave without dissection dissyllabic endings, as "cymbals" or "gladness"; so perhaps we may venture to dismiss them as provided for on the same principle by both schools of pointing. I have not calculated the deduction which should be made on this account from the 1,376 trochaic verses, but it must be very large, probably 1,200 at least, leaving comparatively few endings to give trouble, and that to every school of pointing in common; for words of three or four syllables, occurring at the end of a verse, are admittedly difficult to treat, and not over satisfactory, however treated. Of course, if, with a total disregard of accent, they are taken strictly syllabically, there is an end of discussion; but no experienced and educated ear can tolerate without distaste and remonstrance such endings as "might-i-er," "wick-ed-ness," "en-em-y," "scat-ter-ed," not to mention, as being past all endurance, "testimo-nies," "wickedness-es," and the like. But the question cannot be decided off-hand, as if there were but one permissible solution.

It may be thought too minute and technical a doctrine, but in my view the kind of letters of which the word is made up has a distinct bearing upon the treatment it ought to receive. When the word is chiefly composed of short vowels and liquids, as "enemy," "equity," or contains them in its later syllables, as "testimonies," "sanctuary," allowing the word to run easily and quickly, I fancy the ear asks for the assignment of the word as a whole to the final note, without any attempt to divide it, and thereby add unusual weight to the very slight secondary accent. The case is somewhat different with compound words like "dwelling-place," "water-side," or with a word like "right-eousness," with its dental and its sibilants. It is felt to be less offensive to the ear to divide such words, although in the last case there is the fatal affix to reckon with. "Persecutors," again, is more bearable than "testi-monies," a form of mutilation, which suggests a ludicrous meaning. Nothing, let me urge, is more hopelessly disappointing and disastrous than going to work with an undeviating plan cut and dried down to the smallest particular.

Important as are the above-mentioned subjects, which chiefly affect the treatment of individual verses, they are not nearly of so much moment as others connected with the art of chanting. For example, the opinion once held and expressed by a few is now becoming general, that it is desirable, not to say necessary, to arrange the Psalms strophically, so as to illustrate their construction, and the sequence and inter-dependence of their several sections. Marks of expression and of mode of performance are more carefully and accurately inserted and regarded than heretofore. Single, double, triple, and quadruple chants are assigned to the Psalms or groups of verses for which they appear to be the most appropriate, and so forth. No doubt these things demand learning and judgment in application, and thought and care in performance; but happily the time is now past when, in such matters, the human instinct for progress and improvement was derided as an amateurish and troublesome fad, barely worth consideration, much less adoption, with all the unwonted and unwelcome diligence and attention involved.

And in presence of this forward movement we are dictatorially referred to the dark ages for the culminating period of Church music, which then consisted, what there was of it, in the relics of Greek modes, half-forgotten, and imperfectly understood.

Free rhythm! Ecclesiastical melody! The grotesque gestures and formless howls of savages, shaping themselves slowly and tentatively, under the restless and importunate sense of inadequacy, into that definiteness without which there is no such thing as art.

It has taken centuries for Europe to make her music what it is, and yet, as regards chanting, we are called upon, alas, in the name of the Church, to despise and reject the heritage on which we have entered, as if it were a worthless counterfeit.—I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

A Cathedralist.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Doubtless Mr. Heywood will undertake the defence of his book against "A Cathedralist," but as the latter has referred to me, perhaps you will allow me a word in reply.

1. As to accent. I understand Mr. Heywood to say that the ante-penultimate is the natural place of the musical accent, and that in weak or Trochaic endings the pointing should be arranged accordingly. Circumstances require, however, that sometimes the accent should fall on the last note. The normal position of the accent is on the first of the bar, but when words of the character of psalms and hymns have to be fitted to music of the usual type, it often becomes necessary to modify strong accents and to strengthen weak ones. If "A Cathedralist" does not admit this, how does he justify the following?—

through | my | foolish- | -ness.

He surely will not say that a strong accent must be placed on "tion" and "ness." If he agrees with me that the above is good pointing, he concedes the "Church" case.

2. As to the accent mark. I object to this as misleading, as unnecessary, and as being often wrong. It is misleading because, despite the choirmaster's efforts, the average choir attaches a fictitious importance to it, and regards it as a convenient place to pull up and get its "second wind," and because many think that it points out the only place in the recitation which is to be accented.

Of course this ought not to be so, but all will agree with me that it is so in only too many cases. It is unnecessary, because it is perfectly possible to secure good and even chanting without it by directing the choir to make their rallying-point, so to speak, on the note after the reciting note and not on the reciting note itself. As to my third objection, I readily admit that, in most cases, the syllables from the accent mark fall readily enough within the limits of a semibreve, but why should they always do so? Compare the following:—

ác- | -cording | to thy | word.
Righteousness shall | go be- | -fore him.

Why should the same time be allotted to one syllable, and that a very short one, as to five?

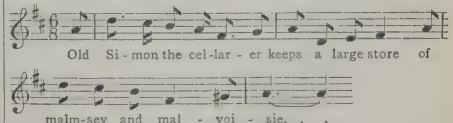
Let it be remembered, in connection with this point, that the chant, when sung, is no longer in any set number of bars. For instance, sing the first verse of Psalm 1 to a single chant, and instead of seven bars you will take about twelve. All talk of seven-bar rhythm is, therefore, beside the question; the chant should be essentially free.

Yours faithfully, J. Percy Baker.

A REMARKABLE THEMATIC COINCIDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I should like to call attention to a most remarkable series of thematic "coincidences" between an Easter anthem recently published in one of your contemporaries and Hatton's "Simon the Cellarer." The song, as every one knows, begins as follows:—



And this is the anthem, which, by the way, is appropriately marked "Con spirito"—

Subsequently we come to—which is not unlike—

While the succeeding bars—

occur note for note in the anthem, as follows—

I enclose my card and beg to subscribe myself,

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Aberdeen.—Mr. J. Hoffmann read, on the 13th ult., before the members of the Philosophical Society, in the Music Hall Buildings, a thoughtful and instructive paper entitled "The Song, with special reference to the Art Song and its composers." The interest of the Lecture was greatly enhanced by the excellent series of examples sung by Mrs. Hoffmann, Mr. A. E. Smith, Mr. W. J. W. Smith, and Mr. J. Kirkby. Professor Stewart, president of the Society, occupied the chair.

Ashford, Kent.—An excellent performance of Molique's "Abraham" was given on the 1st ult., by the combined forces of the Choral and Orchestral Societies. The soloists were Miss Pierce, Miss Mary Reeve, Mr. McBride, Mr. Meacher, and Mr. Richardson, all of whom admirably rendered the parts allotted them. Dr. Wilkes conducted with his usual skill, and deserves the greatest credit for his untiring efforts in promoting the cultivation of good music in Ashford.

Birkenhead.—The Recitals on the Hope-Jones organ in St. John's Church have been continued. Dr. A. L. Peace was the recitalist on January 27, and, on the 17th ult., Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan.

Broadstairs.—On January 29 a successful performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given in the large hall at St. Mary's Home, by the Broadstairs and St. Peter's Choral Society. The choruses were capitally rendered, and the solos excellently sung by Miss Rosa Harris, Miss Connie Hicks, Mr. Charles Rowe, and Mr. Alfred Osmond. Mr. H. Osmond presided at the pianoforte, Mr. T. Russe at the organ, and Mr. D. Lott conducted.

Chigwell.—A special musical Service was held in connection with the dedication Festival of the Parish Church, on the 4th ult., when Dr. Martin's "Military" Service in B flat, and an effective setting of the 100th Psalm, by E. C. Nunn, were very adequately sung. Mr. H. Clinch and Mr. W. Cuttle were the soloists. The service was preceded by a short Organ Recital by Mr. Cuthbert Nunn, and closed with the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Mr. Henry Riding conducted, and Mr. E. C. Nunn accompanied.

Cork.—A Choir Festival was celebrated in St. Peter's Church on the 6th ult., when the music included effective renderings of the anthem "The Souls of the Righteous," by J. C. Marks, and "He shall feed His flock," from "The Messiah." The principal soloists were the Misses B. and N O'Neill, Miss Gabriel, and Messrs. J. C. Lee and W. Jordan.

Enniscorthy, Ireland.—The winter Concert of the Choral Union was given, on January 28, in the Church Institute. The first half of the programme was occupied by Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers," and the second half consisted of part-songs, solos, and instrumental pieces, the last-named being played by the Amateur Orchestral Society. The soloists were Miss H. C. Preston, Mrs. Leslie Mease, Mrs. Carey, Miss M. Jones, Mr. Lamont, Mr. Webb, and Mr. McDermott. Mr. F. Hatson Wright, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's Parish Church, conducted.

Epsom.—The Choral Society's seventh season was concluded on the 1st ult., when the "Creation" (Parts 1 and 2) and a miscellaneous selection, including the Kyrie, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei from Cherubini's Fourth Mass, were successfully performed under the direction of Mr. Avalon Collard. The principal soloists included Miss Florence Monk and Mr. Daniel Price. In the second part Mr. Hugh Bury received an encore for his rendering of Svendsen's Romance for violin, a similar compliment being paid to Mr. Avalon Collard after his singing of Gounod's "O that we two were Maying," and Miss Irene Wood, Miss Rose Wood, and Mr. A. C. Barton, members of the Society, joined Mr. Collard in Balfe's quartet "Lo! the early beam of morning." Mr. H. M. Higgs was the organist and Mrs. Hailes the pianist.

Halstead.—The annual Concert of the Orchestral Society took place on the 6th ult., and fully maintained the standard achieved in former years. The principal works performed were Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Bennett's "Paradise and the Peri" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overtures, and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite. Madame Albu contributed several songs, and Mr. Solomon and Mr. James gave solos on the slide trumpet and bassoon respectively. Mr. F. B. Smythies was principal violin, and Mr. Leake conducted with his wonted skill.

High Wycombe.—The Choral Association gave an effective performance of Cowen's "Rose Maiden" before a large audience, in the Central Hall, on the 5th ult. The principals were Miss J. Jones, Miss E. Himing, Mr. M. Humphreys, and Mr. G. Stubbs. Mr. J. G. Wrigley conducted, and played several pianoforte solos with much success in the second part of the programme.

Maidstone.—Bennett's "May Queen" was performed on January 30, in the Corn Exchange Hall, by a chorus and orchestra of 250 performers. The soloists were Miss A. Sargent, Miss F. Wallis, Mr. A. Pennington, and Mr. W. Syckelmore. Mr. F. W. Dutnall conducted.

Newcastle.—One of the most successful Concerts of the Harmonic Society was given in the Olympia Hall on January 26, when Mr. John F. Barnett's tuneful cantata "The Ancient Mariner" was sung by Madame Fanny Moody, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. Tom Child, Mr. Chilver Wilson, and an excellently trained body of choristers under the conductorship of Dr. Chambers.

The accompaniments were admirably played by Miss Etta Newborne.——On the 13th ult. Miss Frances Simpson commenced a series of six Pianoforte Recitals, at the Lecture Hall, Hood Street. The second, on the 20th ult., consisted of a Lecture on "The Development of the Sonata," by Miss Oliveria Prescott, who, with Miss Simpson, supplied the illustrations. Miss Prescott's remarks were heard with evident interest, but the audience should have been larger.

North Malvern.—The Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Higley, gave an effective performance of "The Messiah," on the 15th ult., the solos being sung by Madame Ada Patterson, Miss M. Helmore, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. W. J. L. Higley. The orchestra, in which a number of local amateurs of both sexes assisted, was led by Mr. W. Ellis.

North Walsham.—Dr. Hiles's Musical Society gave, on January 31, a performance in the Church Room of his Oratorio "Nehemiah." The choir was augmented for the occasion, and the accompaniments played by an orchestra largely composed of members of the Norwich Philharmonic Society. The soloists were Miss A. Vincent, Miss F. Acton, and Messrs. H. J. Brookes, W. D. Tomkins, J. J. Manning, and H. Wimble. The choruses were well sung, and the work had a cordial reception.

Ore.—The recently-formed Choral Society made a successful début on January 31, when Mr. J. F. Hindell conducted a creditable performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," the solos in which were sung by Miss Starr, Miss Goble, Mr. V. Sellman, and Mr. H. Baker. The programme also contained miscellaneous songs sung by Miss Nelson and Miss L. Peddlesden, and a violin solo played by Mr. Wooley. Mr. F. E. Peddlesden acted as accompanist at the pianoforte, and a small orchestra gave valuable help in the rendering the Oratorio.

Red Hill.—Under the able conductorship of Mr. H. Graves, the Society of Instrumentalists, on January 30, in the Market Hall, rendered in most praiseworthy manner an excellent programme, which included Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Mr. Edward German's three piquant Dances from his incidental music to "Henry VIII." Mr. John Sandbrook gave great satisfaction as the vocalist.

Romford.—Sir John Stainer's cantata "The Crucifixion" was sung, on the 15th ult., by an augmented choir of over eighty voices, in the Parish Church. The Rev. A. R. T. Eales presided at the organ, and Mr. Charles Wood, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, conducted.

St. Alban's, Herts.—Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was sung, on January 31, by the Oratorio Society, to a large and appreciative audience, in the County Club Hall. The solos were entrusted to Miss Carrington, Miss F. Rose, Mr. Trefelyn David, and Mr. J. Sandbrook; Mr. Stanley Blagrove led an efficient orchestra, and Miss L. Rose assisted at an American organ. The performance was the first by this Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Speer, who has succeeded Mr. Morton Glover, owing to the ill-health of the latter.

Southend.—Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was successfully performed by the Choral Society, at the Public Hall, on the 6th ult. The choruses were sung with precision and effect, indicating able and careful training on the part of the Conductor, Mr. W. G. Brighten. The solos were well sung by Mrs. Beard, Misses Cartwright, Stephens, Morphey, Parker, Gregory, and Craig (members of the choir), and Miss Jessie Browning. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra led by Mr. Val Mason. Mr. Charles Fry was engaged to recite the lyrics and also gave several recitations in the second part. Mr. Harry Read gave an excellent rendering of Beethoven's "Sonate Pathétique," and also contributed a Gavotte played by the orchestra, which was very favourably received.

Stratford.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed, by a band and chorus of about 150 performers, in the Town Hall, Stratford, on January 31, under the direction of Mr. W. Harding Bonner. Mr. Henry Riding presided at the fine new organ, and the solos were taken by Miss Florence Monk, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. James Horncastle, and Mr. Robert Grice.

Walthamstow.—On the 6th ult. the Musical Society gave the second Concert of the season, in the Victoria Hall, before a numerous audience. The programme included Schumann's cantata "The Pilgrimage of the Rose," ballads and madrigals sung by the choir, and several orchestral pieces rendered by an orchestra of about fifty performers, under the leadership of Mr. H. Baynton. The principals were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Agnes Jackson, Mr. Otto Dene, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Dr. J. Warriner conducted.

Darby, assisted by a small orchestra, accompanied the Oratorio, and Mr. Edward Cook conducted.

Windsor.—Princess Christian took part, with Sir Walter Parratt, in the performance of the pianoforte duet arrangement of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," at a Concert on the 5th ult., at the Albert Institute, in aid of the local Infant Nursery. Her Royal Highness also assisted in the rendering of Moscheles's "Les Contrastes" (written for eight hands), the other players being Miss G. M. Liddell, Miss Caroline Bigge, and Sir Walter Parratt.

Woolwich.—A new humorous cantata, entitled "The King's Decree," written by Mr. H. Webber, and composed by Mr. H. W. Jones, was successfully produced by the Choral Union, on the 6th ult., in the Royal Assembly Rooms. The characters were effectively impersonated by Miss Annie Swinfen, Miss Annie Fisher, Mr. W. H. Webb, and Mr. I. Orchard; Mr. A. Lorey led an efficient orchestra, and Mr. T. J. Nell conducted. The programme also included Handel's "Zadok the Priest" and several well-known madrigals and part-songs, in which the choir fully maintained its reputation. Good service was rendered by Madame Tester-Jones at the pianoforte and Mr. H. W. Jones at the organ.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. H. N. Hay, Organist and Choirmaster to Cross Street (Baptist) Chapel, Islington.—Mr. Frank Butler, Organist and Choirmaster to the New Parish Church, Hove.—Mr. Warren Tear, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's, Kennington.—Mr. D. A. Fox, Organist and Choirmaster to Upper Norwood Congregational Church.—Mr. Charles D. Mortimer, to St. Catherine's, Wigan.

A SHORT HISTORICAL ACCOUNT

AT

WITH A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF GRADUATES IN THAT FACULTY FROM THE YEAR 1463

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

IN THE TWILIGHT

(FOUR-PART SONG).

I.

Come! . . .
Come and watch the twilight tender,
Creeping o'er the hill and dale,
While the sun in dying splendour
Tints the wood and mossy vale:
Come and list the winds' low sighing,
Breathing soft the breath of flow'rs,
Where the pearly dews are lying
O'er the woodbine-scented bow'rs.

II.

Come! . . .
Come and watch the lilies closing,
While the streamlet laps our feet,
And the fairy-bells reposing
Kiss the drowsy meadowsweet;
Where the river wanders, dreaming,
Murm'ring just a soft refrain,
Where, 'neath silver moonlight beaming,
Night-birds sing their old sweet strain.

III.

Come! . . .
Come and watch the white stars creeping,
Pale and pure from ether blue,
Like the angels, vigil keeping,
Ever tender, ever true;
Weary heart! come, cease your sorrow,
Heart with worldly care oppressed,
Come, from nature's calm to borrow
Peace for thee, sweet peace, and rest.

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

MUSICAL GESTURES

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC

BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE

MUS. DOC., OXON.

Organist and Master of the Choristers of Westminster Abbey; Gresham Professor of Music.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This little work is designed to present, by means of a series of short lessons, in which manual exercises are the leading feature, an attractive and expeditious method of learning the simpler rudiments of music.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS. In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

No little amusement was created last evening by the spectacle of a number of Dr. Bridge's choristers crossing the platform with measured tread while enunciating the notes of the scale in any key desired. All the "Gestures" were duly illustrated in this way, and their simplicity was thus effectually brought home to the minds of the audience. . . . Dr. Bridge's "Gestures" will facilitate the learning of the "rudiments" by young pupils.

STANDARD.

Dr. Bridge afterwards proceeded to put near a score of choristers from Westminster Abbey through musical gestures—twenty-three in all—and with their assistance he abundantly demonstrated his simple but effective method.

DAILY NEWS.

Professor Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, has just written for Novello's "Music Primers" an interesting account of how the Abbey choirboys are taught in class by means of "Musical Gestures." The shapes of notes and the rests are shown by various positions of the fingers and arms, the tones and semitones by steps and half steps, and so forth, there being twenty-three "Gestures," each illustrated by the picture of an Abbey boy in the act of performing it. At Westminster Abbey the juniors have long practised the rudiments by means of this ingenious device, and Professor Bridge enthusiastically declares the boys prefer the music game to cricket. He is now publishing the book mainly for use in the nursery, for school classes, and for country choirs.

MORNING POST.

With the aid of the Westminster Choristers, who were in attendance, Dr. Bridge ran through the whole set of lessons, and the proficiency of the boys and the ingenious and amusing gestures and rhymes employed occasioned hearty applause and laughter. The whole time occupied by the lecture and the practical exposition of the method was only just over an hour.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Judging from the illustrations, vocal and physical, shown by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, the invention should be of immense service to country choirmasters.

MORNING LEADER.

. . . Bids fair to win immortality in the grateful recollection of future generations of children. He has invented a new system of imparting the rudiments of music to children, a system which, in his own words, "combines physical training with musical training." . . . By Dr. Bridge's system—one of the very greatest ingenuity—you enlist a child's love of exercise and movement in aid of his musical studies.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Like most good inventions, its simplicity is its chief merit. It will save the instructors and pupils alike many a weary half-hour.

ECHO.

The ingenious manual devices by which these highly-trained lads represented the duration of notes and their position and the various written signs of music, beat time double, triple, and quadruple, sang and stepped the scales, and explained the meaning of the gestures, in their natural voices, and not in stupid monotone, were as novel as they were pleasing, and were evidently as much enjoyed by the boys as the spectators.

SUNDAY TIMES.

An expeditious method of learning the simpler rudiments of music by means of manual exercises. . . . Should be of much service in training country choirs.

FIGARO.

It is a very ingenious idea, and admirably suited for the nursery and also for training village church choirs and others.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The organist of Westminster Abbey has often something new to tell us, and as he is well provided with a set of chubby cherubs on whom experiments can be tried, we are not surprised at his putting forth a new means of teaching youngsters the signs in music. . . . At the end of the book are ten Vocal Exercises in rhyme, designed to impress upon beginners the rudiments of music. These are most cleverly constructed, and we advise choirmasters to get the book and make use of them.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Dr. Bridge's system may be described as a sort of musical drill, in which the scholars' gestures are ingeniously contrived to represent the various symbols used to express notes, clefs, rests, &c. In addition to this, some vocal exercises, entitled "Rudiments in Rhyme," are well calculated to "impress upon beginners the rudiments of music, while exercising at the same time their voices."

LEEDS MERCURY.

A portion of the Abbey Soprano Choir illustrated vocally the novel but simple scheme of Professor Bridge, and the proceedings, held in the City of London School, were followed with considerable interest by a crowded audience.

GLASGOW HERALD.

A most ingenious little book. . . . The book is largely made up of beautifully drawn diagrams and figures, which make the work of the teacher plain. . . . A better method than that here laid down of driving the elements into boys' heads could scarcely be imagined.

This system is already in use in many schools and choirs.

Dr. Sweeting, Music Master of Rossall School, writes: "The result is admirable. The 'Gestures' and also the rudiments in rhyme will, I am sure, lighten the dry part of many a Music Master's work."

Mr. Hanforth, Mus. B., Organist of Sheffield Parish Church, says: "It is a capital system. I have given my boys one good dose already—a class of about thirty. From the avidity with which it was swallowed I believe it will prove a popular medicine. This morning I found them busily conducting a class among themselves."

Dr. Sawyer speaks in high terms of the "Gestures," which he has introduced in his various choirs and classes.

Choirmasters, or heads of schools, can see the Westminster boys at the "Gestures" on written application to Dr. Bridge.

THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD (Psalm 23). A Choral Setting, without Solos.

By N. KILBURN, Mus.B.

Price One Shilling.

"This work has already been favourably reviewed in these columns, and we are pleased to say that its performance more than justified the good opinion derived from a perusal of the score. It is a charming work, well written and effective, and should be taken up by choral societies in search of interesting novelties."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Written in modern style and enriched with skilful orchestration, this composition met with a full measure of success, and the composer was loudly recalled at the close. The chorus parts are scholarly and effective, and masterly examples of fugal writing are given. Altogether it is a work which resolutely speaks for itself, is capable of standing alone, and therefore must live."—Durham Chronicle.

"The first part finished with Mr. Kilburn's setting of the 23rd Psalm. This was the first complete performance of the work, and the audience were delighted with it."—Sunderland Echo.

"Mr. Kilburn's 23rd Psalm is a welcome addition to works available for Church Festival use; as there is a tendency at the present day to restore oratorio to its original home, choirmasters will find this work particularly suited to their needs."—Northern Echo.

LOTT'S
CLASSICAL
PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

Bound in Cloth, Four Shillings net.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor overcomes the difficult task of 'teaching the young idea how to shoot' over musical preserves. It is a decidedly practical work, has no superfluous padding, and is so simple in its explanations that the veriest tyro might teach himself to master scales major and minor, and encourage himself en route by mild diversion with Haydn, Handel, Meyerbeer, Mozart, and others. The composer of these exercises has wisely seen that on the 'nubbly' high-road of musical education a few milestones are necessary to cheer the fainting heart, and amidst the dough of prosaic explanation he has inserted here and there a plum from the old masters—a plum of just sufficient size to whet the appetite without the risk of indigestion."—The Gentlewoman.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor will be found eminently suitable for teaching purposes, and we can confidently recommend it as a guide to all beginners. The examples have been selected with care, and are of a character likely to please the young pupil, besides moulding his or her taste to the elements of classical form. A glossary of general musical terms is to be found at the end of the volume. The printing throughout is clear, and the musical type well displayed."—The New Quarterly Musical Review.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor is a book of instruction which has some special qualities of its own. The author, a refined and thoughtful musician, in this work takes the student into paths apart from the flashy 'airs with variations' school, and the extracts given are from composers little known in the commonplace routine of ordinary teaching. To those who desire to interpret the higher forms of pianoforte composition, Lott's Tutor will be a sound and practical guide."—The Era.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor has some distinguishing features from its fellow tutors. After, with commendable brevity and clearness, teaching the elementary portion, the composer starts at once with extracts from classical masters of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. For example, Martin Luther's Chorale 'Eine Feste Burg' (1483-1546), 'God save the Queen' (John Bull, 1563-1628), 'Dead March' in 'Saul' (G. F. Handel, 1685-1759), Chorus from 'Les Huguenots' (J. Meyerbeer, 1791-1864), 'God preserve the Emperor' (J. Haydn), 'Rondo' (Anton Diabelli, 1761-1858), examples from Beethoven, Corelli, Mendelssohn, 'The Old Hundredth Psalm' (Claude Goudimel, 1516-1572), and other less well-known old composers."—Daily News.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor deserves more than passing mention. Instead of containing a heterogeneous collection of popular melodies, interspersed with airs from Italian and other operas, as is usual in works of this class, we have a careful compilation of extracts from the works of the great masters, judiciously arranged according to their respective degrees of difficulty, thus justifying its title. We have, on the whole, nothing but praise for the work, it being a decided improvement on any manual of initiatory instruction we have seen."—The Morning.

UNA

FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

VERSE BY

FREDERICK ENOCH

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PERFORMANCE IN THE PUBLIC HALL, IPSWICH, JANUARY 16, 1894.

"'Una' has been so recently described and criticised that there is no necessity for detailed reference to the composition. Roughly speaking, it is founded upon the story of 'Una and the Lion' as told in the 'Faërie Queene,' amplified in verse of unusual excellence by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and full of romantic incident which commends itself to picturesque musical expression. . . . possesses in a marked degree the great charms of tunefulness and vivacity. It is above all things an understandable Cantata—not one of those crabbed and crooked things which no ordinary person can understand. The most striking and romantic number is undoubtedly the chorus 'Hark! the Angelus is calling,' in which the campanels used at Norwich (manufactured by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) were introduced. It is free and comparatively simple in style, but full of poetic melody, recalling by a flash of association that famous and familiar picture of 'The Angelus.' This was admirably given, and the choruses throughout, indeed, 'went' with great spirit and precision, reflecting much credit upon those engaged, and upon Mr. Dalby's efforts as leader in preparing for the Concert. The swinging chorus, 'Let's hasten on,' was loudly encored. A similar compliment was paid to all four soloists for their best efforts—to Mr. Henry Piercy for the song, 'Shine, vestal star'; to Miss Croft for the taking solo, 'The enchanter's wand,' which should become a popular excerpt; to Miss Rose Long, who did full and sympathetic justice to the charming song, 'O love will love,' and to Mr. Daniel Price for his rendering of 'A Palmer, met upon my way.' At the close, the performance as a whole was loudly applauded by the well-pleased audience. The composer himself conducted, and was most heartily welcomed as he came to the front of the platform."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and sauve part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction."—South-Western World.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

"This Anthem for four voices is a very musicianly performance. . . . the second movement is an admirable duet for two bass voices, and where both are not available, the first bass may be sung as a solo. . . . An excellent and melodious fugue, extending to seven pages, completes the work, and affords good examples of imitation, augmentation, diminution, &c. . . . Seventeen pages of good Church music for sixpence."—Church Times.

"This Anthem for four voices can be strongly commended. . . . This setting of Ps. cxiv. should be frequently heard, and we have little doubt that it will give pleasure."—Birmingham Weekly Mercury.

"Reveals no slight skill and constructive ability. . . . Among the many new anthems awaiting attention this emphatically deserves an early trial."—Leeds Mercury.

"This is a really effective Anthem. . . . The words 'The sea saw that and fled' are finely set as a duet for two basses. . . . The final chorus is ingenious and skilful, . . . the subjects are well and closely worked out. . . . The Anthem well deserves the attention of organists and choirs."—Scarborough Gazette.

This, his latest work, will find acceptance amongst Choral Societies and Church Choirs. The Choruses are bold and effective. The Solo writing is melodious and well suited to the words. The quartet 'Blessed are the dead' is really charming."—Nonconformist Musical Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but withal melodious, musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Need it be said to those who know Dr. Mackenzie's "Pibroch" that this national music—for such, after all, it is—comes to us with the great advantage of individual distinction. As much may be said of everything from the same pen. The composer never drops into the common speech of his art. . . . Called twice to the platform when her task had ended, Lady Hallé returned on the second occasion with Dr. Mackenzie and presented him for applause which the audience were quite in the mood to bestow.

MORNING POST.

Although the themes upon which it is founded are original, there is no mistaking the strong Scottish flavour that pervades them. What Grieg is to Norway, and Dvorák to Bohemia, Mackenzie is to Scotland. The rhythmic peculiarities of his native music have become so fixedly located in his mind that he reproduces them spontaneously in his works. It cannot be said of him that he imitates the characteristics of Scotch music, for he has made these his own. Those who are familiar with his "Pibroch" will doubtless realise what we mean. It is when he is thoroughly himself—that is, when he expresses himself in his own native musical dialect—that Mackenzie appeals to us most.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

A beautiful, poetical, eminently characteristic piece, while laudably free from what are vulgarly supposed to be the genuine characteristics of Scotch music.

THE GLOBE.

The Scottish composer's "Highland Ballad," from Op. 47, finely played by Lady Hallé, is a piece more remarkable for absolute beauty than for national or local colouring; it makes its effect none the less well on account of this, though it requires a finished artist to do it justice.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times, December 11, 1893.

THE PROPER REPAIR OF HARPS.
Messrs. Erard regret to find it necessary to caution the public against entrusting their harps to the hands of unskilful workmen representing themselves to have been at some time associated with their firm. In most cases people thus representing themselves have been at some time Tuners of Pianofortes only in Messrs. Erard's establishment, and have No Practical Knowledge whatever of Messrs. Erard's Harp factory.
In some cases representations are made that the materials employed in the manufacture of harps by Messrs. Erard have been purchased by other people. Messrs. Erard beg to say that neither now nor at any previous time have they supplied any of the materials employed in the manufacture and repair of the harps at present used. The material so referred to by unskilful repairers is invariably the discarded stock belonging only to obsolete instruments.
The only really skilful harp workmen are those to be found in Messrs. Erard's factories in London and Paris.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1894.

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES OF BEETHOVEN.

The following Reminiscences, by Louis Schloesser, translated by his son, Mr. Adolph Schloesser, will, it is hoped, prove interesting to the readers of The Musical Times.

(Louis Schloesser was born in Darmstadt, November 17, 1800, and died there November 17, 1886. After studying under Rinck, he went to Vienna and afterwards to the Paris Conservatoire. On his return to Darmstadt, he joined the orchestra of the Opera, eventually becoming Kapellmeister. He retired from active service after his fiftieth year of office, and devoted himself chiefly to musical literature.)

In taking up my pen to recall those never to be forgotten hours I passed with Beethoven during my stay in Vienna, the time seems to my mind like a rose-hued dream. More than half-a-century has passed since then, and I am amongst the very few living who had a personal acquaintance with the great man. His noble features, large piercing eyes, his finely moulded mouth (generally shut) with its brilliant white teeth, are all engraved indelibly on my memory. His figure was broad and rather short, but his head, with its wild hair, at once attracted attention; and when he spoke, whatever the subject might be—himself, his art, or his work—one hung with admiration on his flowing words, which so clearly showed his large mind full of grand ideas, that he delivered so clearly and instructively, so simply, and without a trace of affectation.

I cannot deny that at times he was very melancholy, but his many family troubles and disagreements, added to his great deafness, must plead for him; and personally, I experienced unvarying kindness and friendly consideration, for which I have always felt most grateful.

A journey from Darmstadt to Vienna was, in 1822, not particularly amusing, and a young fellow of twenty-two years of age, as I was, felt the annoyance of confinement in a stuffy diligence during several days and nights. But I was a budding young musician, impatient to commence study under Mayseder and Ignatz von Seyfried, to whom Spohr had written on my behalf. So I soon forgot all my difficulties, and entered the Kaiserstadt with a joyful heart. I could not have timed my stay in Vienna more favourably, for beside the giant Beethoven, I found there Rossini, Carl Maria von Weber, Schubert, Gyrowetz, Weigl, Abbé Stadler, Kreutzer, and others, and their works were performed at the Opera House, next to the Kärnthnerthor, in such a magnificent and perfect manner as may never happen again. Besides this, there were grand services in the churches, under Salieri, Eibler, and others; chamber concerts at Kiesewetter's and Mosel's; the excellent quartet parties of Schuppanzigh, Mayseder, Link, and Merk; the literary parties at Castelli's, and visits to Franz Schubert.

Some months passed in these enjoyments and with my studies, but the wish of my heart, my longing desire if only to see Beethoven, remained unfulfilled! I could not even clearly ascertain his address, as my friends told me he spent much of his time at Baden, and when in Vienna owned several lodgings at the same time! By the advice of Seyfried I called several times at the music warehouse of Steiner and Haslinger, as Beethoven was frequently there between twelve and one, but, alas, without success. I went with Schuppanzigh to the café by the Mehlmarkt, opposite the Kapuziner Kloster, where Beethoven often read the newspapers; but fate was against me until one day, by chance, I saw on the posters at the corner of the street, that "Fidelio" was announced for November 4, 1822. I did not fail to attend, and the impression this great work made on me and on the public, with the parts filled by

Wilhelmina Schröder as Leonora, Haitzinger as Florestan, and Forti as Pizarro, was as overwhelming as it was affecting. But at the time of which I speak, the tendency, especially in Vienna, was chiefly toward the Italian school, and the comprehension of a really dramatic musical interpretation had lain dormant until now in the greater part of the public. But this evening enthusiasm was awakened, and the crammed house was as if electrified! At the close of the performance I was so lost in delight with the glorious Finale that the house was nearly empty before I awoke and went into the lobby, at the same moment that three gentlemen, arm-in-arm, entered it from the pit-boxes. I noticed that their appearance created a sort of commotion in the crowd, and my friend, Franz Schubert, tapped me on the shoulder and pointed to one of the three, who had just turned round at the door. I immediately recognised Beethoven, so well known to me by his portraits. Whether I screamed with excitement, or stood dumb, I know not; but I quickly recovered and followed him and his two companions (Schindler and Breunig) downstairs, and through street after street, until they were lost in the darkness, and I turned my steps homewards, reflecting on the combined joy and sadness this great man must feel in seeing this immense work so splendidly performed, and yet being deprived of that sense which would have enabled him to hear the harmonies which he had called to life, but which he could only realise in his mind's delicate vibrations. At last I had seen him, but to speak to him seemed as far off as ever. Towards spring I called on my countryman and friend, Baron von Türckheim, the ambassador of the Grand Duke of Hesse at the Imperial Court. He was a true devotee of music, seldom missing a performance at the Opera, and he was very fond of discussing the merits with me afterwards; he had independent opinions which always deserved respect. On this occasion, after various discussions (musical), he suddenly asked me, "Well, have you made the acquaintance of your idol yet? Have you spoken with Beethoven?" "Alas! no," I replied. "Well, I will at once give you the opportunity then. Beethoven has composed a 'Missa solennis,' which he wants to publish by subscription, and he wrote a letter to His Royal Highness the Grand Duke. Here is the kind and flattering reply, with the ducal seal, which, if you like, you may personally deliver to Beethoven, at Kothgasse, No. 60, first floor, left door." With joy I took the letter from the Baron, and jumped into a cab to take me to the address in the Wiedner Vorstadt—a name of rather desolate sound, which was quite borne out by the commonplace looking house which I could not bear to connect with the name of Beethoven. I quickly ran up the five or six rough steps, anxious to get out of the sound of the metallic hammer at a blacksmith's shop opposite, and entering a passage, shut the door behind me. I ascended a dark staircase, my pulses beating in tempo prestissimo, and stood before the brown door behind which I hoped to find my musical god. I knocked gently with no result, then summoning up my courage, and remembering that I came as a sort of chargé d'affaires, I opened the door and stood in a low, dark kitchen, black with smoke, which seemed also to serve as an ante-room. "And this leads to the sanctum of my idol!" I thought in astonishment. But so it was, and constantly in my later visits Beethoven would see me out through this dark hole to the stairs. Again I knocked at the next door, but nobody answering I bravely entered, and found myself in a low but fairly spacious room. In the middle stood a large square table, and this, as well as the chairs, was untidily covered with books, papers, manuscripts, pencils, and newspapers. A watch and an ear-trumpet of some yellow metal were also lying about, and the whole place was strewn with odds and ends. By the wall stood a bed, also completely covered with music, printed and manuscript. Two window recesses of unpainted pine wood and covered with writing in pencil caught my eye, and in one of these recesses stood Beethoven! His back was to me and he was busily writing on the wood, apparently making figures and calculations. The poor man had not heard the door open, nor had he felt my presence, so I advanced some steps very noisily, thinking he might feel the vibration, which he did, and turning round immediately, looked in surprise to see a stranger before him. He immediately apologized, saying that he had just sent out his housekeeper, and so had no one to announce visitors. I was at once impressed by the grand head in its frame of shaggy hair, by the serious eyes and the kindly-shaped mouth, which gave him such a friendly expression when he talked. Evidently he had just finished breakfast, for a napkin was on his chair with which he continually wiped his white teeth, a habit I often noticed afterwards. For the moment forgetting his deafness, I began explaining the motive of my visit; but finding he did not hear me, I handed him the Grand Duke's letter. (I am not sure whether this document was found amongst his papers after his death, but he certainly received it from me.) After having broken the big seal and read the letter, Beethoven shook hands with me, and embraced me as if I had been the bearer of the most happy message. "This is a letter which does the writer honour," he said. "Your Grand Duke writes like a princely patron and a thorough musician. It is not only the acceptance of my composition which gives me such satisfaction, but the appreciation he expresses for art and his admiration of my works." I answered through the ear-trumpet that he was the greatest living composer, that his symphonies, quartets, &c., were received with enthusiasm wherever performed, and that everyone hoped many more works were to come. Beethoven, though averse to flattery, was not insensible to this success in foreign countries, particularly when told of it, as in my case, with the ring of truth and sincerity. I told him also of my first sight of him after the performance of "Fidelio," and how I had followed him through so many streets. This seemed to amuse him very much. "Why did you not speak to me then, or come to me before this? I daresay you have heard all manner of stupid stories about me." He now put aside the ear-trumpet, as he said it affected his head, and that his deafness had been wrongly treated by the doctors; that it was not caused locally from the ear, but from the stomach. These were his words, and his idea of the cause. From now, onwards, I always used paper and pencil in conversing with him, and he understood the smallest hint, answering most minutely. He was very interested to receive some details of the life of the Grand Duke of Hesse, Ludwig I., who, when he was Hereditary Prince, knew Gluck in Paris, and had brought all his operas to Darmstadt, where they are in the Court Musical Library in plain blue bindings, and with many remarks in them in the prince's handwriting.

"What a grand mind," said Beethoven, "had this Gluck! With what boldness, energy, and heart he expressed his ideas." He then made some sarcastic remarks on the prevailing musical taste in Vienna. He enquired with interest about my studies, approved of my masters—Seyfried, Mayseder, Worzischek—and invited me to show him some of my compositions, that he might judge of my abilities. I told him that I had just finished a cantata, "Der Abend," words by Kosegarten, also a drama, "Correggio," written by Ohlenschläger. "Well," said Beethoven, "bring me the orchestral score the day after to-morrow, and dine with me. It will not be a grand feast, but there will be enough for us two." He wrote his address on a piece of paper for me: "L. van Beethoven, Kothgasse, No. 60, first floor, left door," and this of course I preserved as a holy relic. I left him my card, and we parted, he saying to me: "Whenever or wherever I can help you, I shall always be at your service."

All my friends were astonished at his friendly reception of me, so contrary to his usual habit and to his reputation as an unapproachable hermit. I found him then and always most paternal and noble, most kind and friendly.

FROM MY STUDY.

Felice Giardini occupies an interesting position as the first of the great violin virtuosi who, coming to us from abroad, have done so much for the culture of their instrument in this country. By birth a Piedmontese, he began his musical career as a choir-boy in Milan Cathedral, but, on showing a partiality for the violin, he was recalled to Turin by his father, and placed under the care of Somis. Subsequently, Giardini went to Rome and Naples, obtaining, in the southern capital, an engagement at the Opera as ripieno violin. Out of this position he tried to raise himself by means which more immediately secured him a sound box on the ear. He told the story of this mischance to Dr. Burney in after-life, and the Doctor retails it in his history, using the violinist's own words:

"I acquired" — Giardini speaks — "great reputation among the ignorant for my impertinence (in flourishing and changing his part), yet, one night, during the opera, Jomelli, who had composed it, came into the orchestra and, seating himself close by me, I determined to give the Maestro di Capella a touch of my taste and execution, and in the symphony of the next song, which was in a pathetic style, I gave loose to my fingers and fancy, for which I was rewarded by the composer with a violent slap in the face—the best lesson I ever received from a great master in my life."

Giardini came to England in 1750, or thereabouts, and made his first appearance at a Concert for the benefit of Cuzzoni, who, old and fallen upon evil days, appealed to the sympathy of her former admirers. There was a poor attendance, "but," says Burney, "when Giardini played a solo and concerto the applause was so loud and long and furious, as nothing but that bestowed on Garrick ever equalled. I had met him the night before at a private Concert . . . at the house of Napthali Franks, Esq., who was himself one of the best dilettanti performers on the violin at that time, and we were all equally surprised and delighted with the various powers of Giardini, at so early a period of his life; when, besides solos of his own composition of the most brilliant kind, he played several of Tartini's, in manuscript, at sight, and at five or six feet distance from the notes (why mention that, unless to prove that the man had good eyes?) as well as if he had never practised anything else. His tone, bow, execution, graceful carriage of himself and his instrument; playing some of my own music, and making it better than I intended, or had imagined it in the warm moments of conception (ah, Doctor!); and lastly, playing variations, extempore, during half-an-hour, upon a new but extraordinary kind of birthday Minuet which accidentally lay on the harpsichord—all this threw into the utmost astonishment the whole company, who had never been accustomed to hear better performers than Festing, Brown, and Collet."

Festing, then leader at the Opera, did not long survive the coming of Giardini, whose success was a mortal blow. He died in 1752, and, in 1754, the Italian virtuoso stepped into his place. Two years later, Giardini was unwise enough to undertake the management, jointly with Mignotti, and with the usual results. He gave up the reins in 1763, very much the poorer for his venture; afterwards following his legitimate business as leader, soloist, teacher, and composer until 1784, when he left for Naples in the train of Sir William Hamilton (afterwards the husband of Emma Hart), remaining there five years. He should have remained there always, but could not forget the flesh-pots of England, and so came back to this country, only to find that times and men had changed. Giardini had seen his best days; he was old and ill, and, with diminished powers, was glad to play the viola in quartets. He tried management again (at the "little theatre in the Haymarket"), but to no purpose, and when St. Petersburg and Moscow proved as cold as London, he sank under disappointments and died (Moscow, 1796), weighed down by poverty and distress. In prosperity, Giardini made few friends. Biographers describe him as capricious and splenetic; as speaking well of few and quarrelling with many. But for all that he was a great artist, and the precursor, in English musical history, of a long and illustrious line. It is needless to discuss Giardini's compositions. They are forgotten.

There is no need, in this place, for details of a career so well known as that of Paganini, but it may be interesting to reproduce a description of the great violinist's appearance, written on the occasion of his début in London. It is taken from the Times of June 6, 1831:

"A tall, thin man, with features rather emaciated, pale, a sharp aquiline nose, a keen eye, the expression of which is much heightened when he plays. His hair, dark, is worn long behind, and combed off his temples and forehead. His manner grotesque. His appearance is not improved by a tuft of hair which he leaves on his lower lip, neither does it derive any aid from dress; his suit of black being ill-made and loosely worn. The full-length portrait of him in all the shops is an excellent likeness."

Commenting upon this word-sketch, the late Rev. Dr. Cox, who knew Paganini well, remarked:*

"This description is in every respect correct, except as to Paganini's manner being grotesque. So far from that having been the case, his carriage was easy and, when he stood up to play, dignified. The tuft of hair on the chin was an innovation upon the custom of the times which was regarded as something outrageous. The more recent and general habit for civilians to wear both beard and moustache would have driven our fathers wild with exasperation; the only hair permitted by them to be grown upon the face being the 'mutton chop' whisker. It was then the height of fashion for every one, gentle and simple, to undergo the daily torture of shaving."

Whatever may have been Paganini's manner, there was a certain diablerie in his appearance which, we have some reason to believe, he cultivated rather than sought to modify. Dr. Cox speaks of him as gliding about "more like a ghost than a human being," and witnesses still remain who can testify that his entrance upon a concert platform was uncanny in the extreme. Around such a personality legends began to form as by some natural law. "The extraordinary expression of his face," writes Fétis, "his livid paleness, his dark and penetrating eye, together with the sardonic smile which occasionally played upon his lips, appeared to the vulgar, and to certain diseased minds, unmistakable evidences of Satanic origin." In a letter to Fétis, he bitterly complained of calumny on this account, and on others scarcely less reputable, saying, inter alia:

"A still more ridiculous report, at Vienna, tested the credulity of some enthusiasts. I had played the variations entitled 'The Witches,' and they produced some effect. One individual, who was represented to me as of sallow complexion, melancholy air, and bright eye, affirmed that he saw nothing surprising in my performance, for he distinctly beheld, while I was playing my variations, the devil at my elbow directing my arm and guiding my bow. My resemblance to him was a proof of my origin. He was clothed in red; had horns on his head, and carried his tail between his legs. After so minute a description, you will understand, Sir, it was impossible to doubt the fact, hence many concluded they had discovered the secret of what they termed my wonderful feats."

Fétis intimates that the ridiculous ideas prevalent as to this great artist's origin had something to do with the difficulties which arose in connection with the disposal of his remains. There were doubts of his catholicity, held by many who did not go so far as to question his humanity. Ecclesiastics and relatives consequently fought over the body, the one claiming, the other refusing interment in hallowed ground, and kept up the battle for five years.

Paganini's bones found rest at last in a Parmesan village church. Other anecdotes tell of a flower girl, who, meeting the violinist in a lonely place, stood still as one fascinated while he paced up and down before her, declaiming loudly and bursting into fits of demoniacal laughter. Another imaginative person saw nine or ten shadowy hands hovering about the strings of his violin, while some whispered that he held interviews with Satan in an old Florentine castle, whence fearful sounds proceeded on stormy nights.

Paganini's playing might well have suggested the supernatural. At his first performance in London Lindley stammered out (he always stammered), "That's the very devil!" and Mori declared that if unable to find a purchaser for his own violin he would burn it forthwith.

The quaint and scarce portrait of Nicholas Mori now reproduced was issued, as appears from the inscription, just prior to that famous violinist's first benefit concert. Mori appears not to have encouraged counterfeit presentments of himself. A writer in the Musical

Young Orpheus, Master Mori,
Born 24th Jany 1797.

World of June, 1839, states that no likeness of him was ever taken, but his statement, as the reader sees, is not quite correct. The journal just named issued a lithographic portrait of Mori on the occasion of his death in 1839; that, however, was made up from a post mortem cast of the features taken by Deville, the phrenologist, and there seems reason to believe that the drawing now presented is the only one taken from life.

Mori, the son of an Italian wig-maker carrying on business in the New Road, was born on January 24, 1796. He showed signs of musical endowments at a remarkably early age, and was placed under Barthelemon for instruction on the violin when only in his fourth year. At the age of eight he made his first public appearance, at the King's Theatre, and played one of his master's Concertos, described as very difficult and, though forgotten now, known then as "The Emperor." The young musician was so small, it is said, that properly to be seen by the audience it was necessary to place him on a table, in which situation he played all his solos. A little later, he made a great figure at some private concerts given by a surgeon named Heaviside. "In his customary elevation," writes a biographer, "he played at every concert some of the most difficult concertos then published, and on every occasion excited the astonishment of his audience. But he performed a similar part with equal ability at many other houses than that of the fashionable surgeon. There were few concerts in which he was not called upon to assist, and wherever he went he was regarded as the Master Betty of the musical world." Subsequently, Mori became a pupil of Viotti, and fairly entered upon a career which led to great distinction. Mori succeeded Spagnoletti as leader at the Opera; he led quartets at the Philharmonic Concerts when only nineteen; became principal first violin at the Ancient Concerts and most of the provincial festivals, and also a professor at the Royal Academy of Music. In short, all the distinctions open to such an artist were gained and enjoyed without challenge. Mori died suddenly on June 14, 1839, in his forty-third year. His remains rest in Kensal Green Cemetery, to which they were escorted by a host of musicians, including 150 members of metropolitan orchestras. In the list of mourners appear the names of Hatton, Smart, Cramer, Cooke, Lindley, Novello, Dragonetti, Costa, Willman, Oury, Harper, and many more.

When writing of George Aspull, last month, I had not under my eye a notice of that remarkable lad by Dr. Cox, who describes him as "one of the dearest friends of my youth, whose memory I shall never cease to regard and revere." I take the following from the Doctor's "Musical Recollections":

"He (Aspull) was brought before the public very early as a prodigy, and (the old story, ever new) was worked so incessantly both in private practice and public performances that his health entirely gave way, not, however, before he had travelled half over England, and obtained several gold medals as an acknowledgment both of his immediate manifestations of talent and promise of future celebrity. . . . Many of his best compositions were never written; for although he had played them in public as well as in private society, he could not find time to write, and so they are for ever lost. One of these, like an epic poem, would have served to hand down his name to immortality, had it ever been put upon paper. The orchestral accompaniments alone were written for its production at his last Concert at Cambridge. . . . He would have proved the greatest musical genius this country ever produced, there being no similar instance on record here of anyone so young having evinced the unquestionable superiority of talent which he possessed, and yet manifested with the greatest modesty of manner and simplicity of demeanour."

Among my old English song-books is a stumpy little volume in faded brown calf, entitled "The Nightingale. Containing a Collection of Four Hundred and Ninety Two of the most celebrated English Songs. None of which are contained in the other Collections of the same size, called the Syren and the Lark. London. Printed and sold by J. Osborn, at the Golden Ball in Pater-Noster Row. 1742." Prospecting this book, in the gold-miner's sense of the term, I came upon interesting evidence of the opposition with which Italian Opera had to contend, and, incidently, of the eagerness with which the "Beggar's Opera" was supported as a new departure towards the success of our native muse. The fiftieth song in "The Nightingale" (sung to the tune of "King John," &c.) is a bitter diatribe against the favour shown to foreigners, foreign arts, and foreign manners. One or two verses are scarcely quotable at the present time, but enough remain for my purpose:

Come listen, ye English, awhile to my strain,
While I tell you a story will give you much pain,
How Englishmen starve while the foreigners gain.
With a down, &c.

What have you e'er done to deserve such a doom?
With your Fathers your wit is sure all in the Tomb,
That you forfeit your sense for a Squauler of Rome.

No Fool is so dull but their Worth will enhance,
But if all their Nation come hither to dance,
I hope we shall quickly be tired of France.

Court, City, and Country stand on their side,
Our Delight it is grown, and our Boast and our Pride,
To see Englishmen walk while the Foreigners ride.

With Monsieur our Play-bills are stuck ev'ry Day,
Italians, French, Dutchmen fill up ev'ry Way,
And Signior and Monsieur is all we can say.

. . . . . .

In the Manners of England none try to succeed,
Most of us like Frenchmen both habit and feed,
But who can't talk French is a Blockhead indeed.

Our Old English Dishes we're taught to disown,
To Ragousts and Toupees we now are so prone
That we've neither a Dress nor a Dish of our own.

From this general anti-alien screed I pass to a particular example in which Polly Fenton, representative of the heroine in the "Beggar's Opera," is exalted at the expense of foreign rivalry:

Of all the Toasts that Britain boasts,
The grim, the gent, the jolly,
The brown, the fair, the debonair,
There's none cried up like Polly;
Sh'as fir'd the Town, has quite cut down
The Opera of Rolli;
Go where you will, the Subject still
Is pretty, pretty Polly.

There's Madame Faustina-Catso,
And eke Madame Catsoni,
Likewise Signior Senesino,
Are tutte abandoni;
Ha, ha, ha, ha, do, re, mi, fa,
Are now but Farce and Folly;
We're ravish'd all with toll, loll, loll,
And pretty, pretty Polly.

. . . . . .

Ah! Johnny Gay, thy lucky Play
Has made the Criticks grin-a,
They cry 'tis flat, 'tis this, 'tis that,
But let them laugh that win-a;
I swear parbleu, 'tis naif and new,
Ill nature is but folly;
'T has lent a Stitch to Rent of Rich,
And set up Madam Polly.

Next follows a word of warning to the future Duchess of Bolton:

Ah! tuneful Fair, beware, beware,
Nor toy with Star and Garter,
Fine Cloathes may hide a foul Inside,
And you may catch a Tartar.

The remainder of this closing stanza may be omitted with advantage.

Another ditty on the same subject is set to the tune of "The Abbot of Canterbury":

I sing of Discords that happen'd of late,
Of strange Revolutions, but not in the State;
How old England grew fond of old Tunes of her own,
And our Ballads went up, and our Opera's down.
Derry down, &c.

Our Op'ra's, I say, for with our English Money,
We've paid for the trills of Signora Cuzzoni;
Nor yet had I ly'd, had I said Senesino
Had got a brave spell of our good ready Rhino.

They still pick our pockets, and fear no Alarm,
For they thought their Sonata's for ever would charm;
But the bold Johnny Gay, he soon made it appear
That the Songsters had got the wrong Sow by the Ear.

. . . . . .

No quarter they found, nor no Time to take Breath,
He plied them so hard with the mighty Mackheath;
But Captain Mackheath did not quite do his Duty,
He scar'd them, but let them go off with their Booty.

And if ever they dare to engage us agen,
My Life on't, they'll find we are still the best men;
Proud Rome must knock under to fair London City,
And Knights of the Road prove too hard for Banditti.

No more with a languishing Audience surrounded,
Their Cremona's unrosined, their Voices dumbfounded;
They let drop in a fright all their lofty Pretences,
And are out of their Wits to find us in our Senses.

. . . . . .

And what farther remains but to wish them well home,
To the Doge, the Grand Duke, or the old Pope of Rome?
They are gone: Let them go; we shall see 'em no more,
And so farewel to Bravo, and farewel to Encore.

The writer of this lyric may have been a true patriot, he certainly was no true prophet.

REGISTRATION OF MUSIC TEACHERS.

The Conference of Musicians, which is to meet on April 26 to discuss the question of the "Registration of Teachers of Music," will have a delicate and difficult task. Of course, should registration be made compulsory by law, it will not have a retrospective effect; all persons now engaged in teaching must be allowed to register themselves ipso facto. The subject can therefore be approached without fear of doing any present injury; but will registration do any future good? There can be no doubt that one cause of the immense growth of poor and indifferent music-teaching throughout the country is the ease with which it is possible to "profess" music compared to any other "profession." At the present moment anyone who chooses to do so can teach music on his own statement that he is capable of so doing. There are, of course, some very good musicians who stand in this way as self-guaranteed; but there exists also a vast number who are utterly unqualified to teach and yet who secure a good income either by devoting themselves entirely to music, or by teaching in the hours when they are "off business." There is also another large class of teachers which has sprung into existence through the touting for examinees, which is steadily on the increase all over the country. Those who are responsible for granting certificates after these examinations perhaps think they have encouraged young people to study further; in a few cases this may be the result. But a considerable number of those who get a certificate of any kind, however elementary, immediately set up, not as learners, but as teachers. There can be little doubt that large sums of money are annually transferred from the purses of poor parents into the pockets of incompetent music-teachers, the fully qualified professionals being powerless to prevent the process, and having to sit still and watch the steady decrease of their own income until it becomes perilously limited. Should it be decided at the Conference that this happy-go-lucky state of things should be left undisturbed, musicians will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that the subject has been fully looked into. But it may not be possible to leave things as they are: a bill for enforcing Registration of Teachers has been for some time looming on the Parliamentary horizon, and should such a bill get a reading it will be very hard to keep "teachers of music" from falling under one of its clauses. The Conference should prepare itself for such a contingency.

Many persons object to registering anybody as a teacher, on the ground that it is impossible to find out by examination whether a candidate can impart knowledge. True! but this is no argument against finding out whether a candidate has any knowledge to impart, and this can be found by examination. Some persons say that safeguards which are of easy application in other branches of education cannot be applied in the case of an Art. But surely the South Kensington certificates which qualify teachers of drawing have been a great success, a real boon to those who want to teach it and those who want to find teachers. And if we are not mistaken, the Teachers' Certificates of the Tonic Sol-fa College are held in good repute also. Is it not possible for our existing Institutions to combine and take up this matter? Such a course would surely be better than waiting until legislation forces their hands. What is the Incorporated Society of Musicians about? It is to such a body as this that we should naturally look for help. Could a reconstruction of the musical side of the College of Preceptors meet this case? Could the Associated Board put forward a scheme? The best solution would probably be found in a strong combination of existing Institutions, as before suggested. If constituted with fairness and unanimity, such a combined body would almost be powerful enough to act without the cumbersome goad of an Act of Parliament.

MUSICAL PARTICULARISM.

We borrow for our heading a term primarily associated with politics in default of a better word to express a curious tendency which is manifesting itself in our midst at the present moment. Modern music is in many respects so inevitably cosmopolitan that one need not be surprised at, nay rather one may welcome any legitimate effort to secure recognition for the national or folk element. And furthermore, wherever such efforts are made in an artistic spirit, or with a due regard for modern developments, they almost invariably meet with success, as may be evidenced by the instrumental compositions of Brahms or Dvorák, or the vocal arrangements of Herr Korbay or Professor Stanford. Such expressions of the national spirit, in music are one thing; an aggressive particularist propagandism is another, and if we are asked for an instance, we would point to a little volume, entitled "The Revival of Irish Literature," recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, in which Dr. Douglas Hyde, discoursing on the necessity of De-Anglicising Ireland, offers the following remarks on Irish music: "Our music has become Anglicised to an alarming extent. Not only has the national instrument, the harp—which efforts are now being made to revive in the Highlands—become extinct, but even the Irish pipes are threatened with the same fate. In place of the pipers and fiddlers who, even twenty years ago, were comparatively common, we are now menaced by the German band and the barrel organ. Something should be done to keep the native pipes and the native airs amongst us still. If Ireland loses her music she loses what is, after her Gaelic language and literature, her most valuable and most characteristic possession. And she is rapidly losing it. . . . It is difficult to find a remedy for this. I am afraid in this practical age to go so far as to advocate the establishment in Cork or Galway of a small institution in which young and promising pipers might be trained to play all the Irish airs and sent forth to delight the population." It is ungracious to dispel the dreams of an amiable enthusiast, but the history of music effectively negatives the possibility of this artificial revival of performances which formed part and parcel of a bygone age. And to say that Ireland is rapidly losing her music is curiously wide of the mark. On the contrary, the treasures of her musical literature were never more accessible to the student than at the present moment, when the idealised form of their presentation—very different from the vulgarised dilutions of fifty years back—has lent them an added charm, which in their primitive and barbaric form they could never hope to exert on the cultivated ears of to-day.

Having said this much, we frankly admit that the outrages on good taste that are often perpetrated in the name of nationality move us to a lively sympathy with Dr. Hyde's attitude. Take, for example, such a curious outcome of patriotism as "God save Ireland"—we say nothing of the words—the tune of which is none other than that of "Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching." Or, again, what can be less satisfactory, either from the artistic or the national point of view, than the bulk of the songs which figure in the programmes of an Irish Ballad Concert? The words of Lover's songs are seldom without point — often delightfully humorous or charmingly sentimental—but from the melodic or rhythmical point of view they seldom smack of the soil. As for Balfe, the above remarks apply with even greater force. The sentiments of "Killarney" are irreproachable, just as they are in Claribel's "Come back to Erin," but the trail of the Sassenach is over them both. And yet, strange to say, it is precisely these pseudo-Irish ditties, thickly bestrewn in the text with conventional terms of endearment—aroon, mavourneen, and so forth—which are most in evidence at all entertainments in which it is sought to conciliate or do honour to the national sentiment of Ireland. That this is not an exaggerated or misleading account of the situation as far as London is concerned, any one will testify who has attended the St. Patrick's Day celebrations at our leading concert halls. As for Ireland herself, Dr. Hyde gives us an even more deplorable account of the decline of popular discrimination. "A few years ago," he writes, "all our travelling fiddlers and pipers could play the old airs, which were then constantly called for, . . . airs, whether gay or plaintive, which have for so many centuries entranced the Gael. But now English music hall ballads and Scotch songs have gained an enormous place in the répertoire of the wandering minstrel, and the minstrels themselves are becoming fewer and fewer, and the few worse and worse."

There is another side to the medal, of which Dr. Hyde is probably unaware, and which is perhaps hardly calculated to give so fervent a patriot unalloyed satisfaction. Concurrently with the invasion of Ireland by the music hall Muse, there has been a corresponding growth in England amongst cultivated musicians—professional and amateur—of a sympathetic appreciation for the beauties of Irish folk-song. In Ireland the "Harp of Tara" has found a dangerous rival in the song (and dance) of "Ta-ra-ra." We have little doubt that from Donegal to Kerry there are few villages into which the maudlin sentimentality of "After the Ball" has not already permeated. On the other hand, as we have already hinted, genuine Irish melodies were never more fully appreciated in cultivated English musical circles than at the present moment. Whether political considerations may have had anything to say to the case or not, we are not prepared to say. But the fact remains that the more educated the hearer, the keener is the enthusiasm for these beautiful outpourings of the Celtic muse. And if we are correct in this surmise, which is indeed largely borne out by the evidence furnished us by Dr. Hyde himself, the method which he proposes for the remedy of the existing evil is hardly likely to achieve the consummation he so ardently desires. You cannot put the clock back a hundred years in music any more than in any other department of art or letters. It is impossible to withdraw musicians from the influences that are in the air, and force them to cultivate the Muse exclusively on the bagpipes or the harp. To begin with, since the pipers and harpers are practically extinct, where are the professors to be found? The most valuable services rendered to Irish music in the present generation have invariably come from musicians of all-round accomplishment. And what is true of Ireland is true of Scotland and Wales, Bohemia and Hungary. The conditions and opportunities of modern life, with all its facilities for intercommunication, negative the possibility of even the average individual resting content with folk music alone. For good or for evil the puissant and steadily increasing dominion of the modern orchestra has rendered such contentment impossible.

ON A DEAD SINGER.

JANET MONACH PATEY.

In Spring, when up from Southern lands
  Unresting climbs the ardent Sun,
While in his train, with linkèd hands,
  Life, Love, and Joy all sportive run,
The silent birds awake to song,
    And, through the hours of day,
    Pipe loud their jocund lay;
One, blissful, singeth all night long.

When Autumn, bending 'neath rich fruit
  Sprung from th' embrace of Sun and Earth,
And, wearing her most gorgeous suit,
  Moves slow through harvest-home's rude mirth,
The birds are dumb on plain and hill;
    They mourn the darkling hours,
    The faded summer flowers,
That tell of Winter's deathly chill.

She, our lost singer, whom we weep
  As woods drop tears for Philomel,
While pass the nights in silence deep,
  And voiceless is the bosky dell—
She sang through Spring and Summer days,
    Till came the waning light,
    And then would say "Good-night!"
To take long rest 'neath grateful bays.

Ah! doth the peerless nightingale,
  When music ceases from the grove,
Sit mute in some sequestered vale,
  Or silent through the woodlands rove?
Her voice is heard 'neath other skies,
    Telling of dear delights,
    While pass the balmy nights
In ecstasy that never dies.

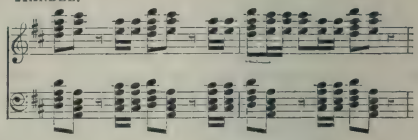
So she whom, hearing not, we mourn,
  From Art's high service doth not cease,
But sings o'er some far-distant bourne,
  Where Beauty dwells with blessèd Peace—
Where constant is the joy of Spring,
    And through celestial bow'rs,
    'Mid bloom of deathless flow'rs,
Sweet music shall for ever ring.

Joseph Bennett.

A few years ago a number of "thematic coincidences" from the works of various composers were published in these columns; and, from time to time, various correspondents are still good enough to forward us examples. Too often, however, the resemblances are, either, so slight that only a very strong desire to discover them could possibly bring them to light; or result from the use of passages which are the "common property" of composers all the world over. Samples of each of these two kinds have been forwarded to us, quite recently, for insertion in The Musical Times; and as, in our opinion, they supply excellent examples of "how not to do it" we give them, in order that they may serve as danger signals. A lady writes from Ireland to say that certain bars from Mozart's Mass in C minor are "almost identical" with part of the "Hallelujah" Chorus from "The Messiah," viz.—

Mozart.

Handel.



Now, harmonically, both these passages are simply repetitions of the plagal cadence (the first is really in G, the second in A), instances of the use of which might of course be multiplied ad infinitum; melodically, they have little in common; and the use, by two composers, of so simple a rhythmic figure as is surely not extraordinary.

Our second example is sent by a well-known amateur. He calls attention to the "remarkable similarity" between this passage from Beethoven's Choral Symphony—and this, from Schubert's in B minor—

Now, as neither the intervals, nor the rhythm, nor the accentuation, nor the harmony of these two passages can be spoken of as coinciding, the "remarkable similarity" to which our esteemed correspondent draws attention reduces itself to one of melodic contour alone; and that, too, of the slightest description. As well say, at once, and have done with it: "There are only two types of melody—one in which the notes go up, and one in which they go down: other differences are immaterial"—for that, if our correspondent's "remarkable similarity" be accepted, is the inevitable corollary. "This coincidence," he naively adds, "seems to have escaped the notice both of Sir George Grove and Mr. Joseph Bennett." We are glad to believe it.

Great are the privileges of genius!—which not only gains immortality for itself, but is able also to bestow the gift on others. One solitary Cardinal Archbishop of Salzburg lives in story because he ill-treated Mozart. Who knows or cares anything about his predecessors or successors? Beethoven perpetuated the names of quite a host of aristocratic Smiths and Browns by the simple expedient of dedicating works to them, and raised one lady to such a pinnacle of fame by writing of her as "my immortal beloved," that she was once in danger of being relegated to the region of poetical abstractions—in short, of becoming a myth. From this fate she was rescued a few years ago by Thayer, whose shrewd inference as to her identity was confirmed in 1890 by the publication of a little book by Mariam Tenger, entitled "Recollections of the Countess Theresa of Brunswick" (Beethoven's Unsterbliche Geliebte). This is now available to English readers, a translation by Miss Gertrude Russell having been published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. The volume contains two portraits: that which was given with the Beethoven number of The Musical Times, and another representing the same lady at an advanced age, taken from the bust executed by Aradi a few years before her death, and which is now in the Museum at Buda Pesth. The letter-press takes the form mainly of a series of interviews—one with the painter Cornelius, and others with the Countess, in the course of which she herself relates the circumstances of her engagement to Beethoven in 1806, and its abrupt termination in 1810; but many other interesting personages also figure in the narrative—such as Baron Spaun, the Telekis, and Giulietta Guicciardi, who is stated to have exclaimed to the Countess Theresa one day, "Do advise me, you cold philosopher! I do so long to throw over my Gallenberg and to marry that beautiful, horrible Beethoven—if only it were not such a come-down!" Theresa, who relates this, adds "God saved Beethoven from Giulietta. She became Countess Gallenberg and disappeared from the stage of his great life." Theresa died in 1861.

The exceedingly interesting celebration which took place at the Royal Academy of Music on the afternoon of the 17th ult., will not soon be effaced from the memories of those who were privileged to attend it. For on that day, on which Signor Manuel Garcia, the doyen of the teaching staff of the Royal Academy, entered on his ninetieth year, his colleagues mustered in full force to present him with a birthday gift and an address suitably expressing their feelings of esteem and admiration for his long and loyal services to that Institution, as well as their affectionate regard for his worth as a man. Mr. Walter Macfarren, to whom, in virtue of his seniority, Dr. Mackenzie gracefully delegated the task of presenting the address, rose to the occasion in a most felicitous speech, in which he bore eloquent testimony to the unflagging zeal and indomitable perseverance which had invariably characterised Signor Garcia's discharge of his duties, while Mr. W. H. Cummings added some interesting details in illustration of his courtesy and kindliness. Signor Garcia acknowledged the gift—a handsome silver tea and coffee service—and the address in a few heartfelt words, and at the close of the proceedings held a sort of informal levée at which he received the congratulations of all present.

How richly those congratulations were deserved some of the present generation may need to be reminded, for Signor Garcia has throughout his long and honourable career resolutely set his face against all publicity or advertisement of his great services. In this connection we make no apology for transcribing the testimony of the authors of the life of his illustrious pupil, Jenny Lind. Speaking of her visit to Paris in 1841, they write as follows: "Signor Garcia's claim to rank as the greatest singing-master of the present century was, even then, and still is incontestable. In fact he fills, in the vocal school of the nineteenth century, the place that was so nobly filled in that of the eighteenth by Niccolo Porpora. Not only do many of the greatest vocalists of the age owe their mastery over the art, and their brilliant and well-earned reputation, to his judicious training; but many more, unable to benefit by his personal instruction, have nevertheless benefited largely by his experience. For his researches into the mechanism of the human voice, his discoveries with the laryngoscope, and the clear-sighted intelligence with which he has turned those discoveries to account, have placed the art of singing upon a sounder basis than it has ever previously been able to claim." Jenny Lind's own testimony is worthy of citation. Writing at the time of her studies in 1842, she says: "I am enchanted with him as a teacher, and I believe him, also, to be a very good man." Another striking proof of the merit of his method is furnished by the fact, not generally known, that Wagner invited Signor Garcia to Bayreuth to superintend the training of his principal singers, having been deeply impressed by the results of his teaching in his own niece, Johanna Wagner, and Madame Schnorr, the original Isolde. Amongst other famous singers formed by him, mention may be made of Catherine Hayes and Mdlle. Nissen (afterwards Madame Siegfried Saloman), whilst the long list of his English pupils includes the names of Mesdames Orridge, Agnes Larkcom, and Messrs. Brereton and Oswald. Born in 1805, and intimate with all the great singers of the palmy days of the bel canto, son of the famous Manuel Garcia, senior, and elder brother of Malibran and Pauline Viardot-Garcia, Signor Garcia has finer materials for a book of reminiscences than any other living musician. It is most earnestly to be hoped that he may yield to the persuasion of his friends and lose no time in committing them to paper.

An important quarterly musical magazine has been started in Italy, under the title of Rivista Musicale Italiana. It is published by the firm of Fratelli Bocca, at Turin. First numbers are notoriously "strong" numbers, and even though it should not again reach the same point of interest, the magazine will be an important factor in the higher musical criticism. Laid out on the broadest lines, it embraces articles on historical research, such as L. Torchi's interesting description of the accompaniment of the first Italian operas and Chilesotti's account of a lute tablature. Contemporary art holds a prominent place, and in fact occupies the bulk of the present number; the essays on Gounod, by A. Jullien and G. Tebaldini—the latter dealing exclusively with the composer's masses and minor sacred works; an interesting pedigree of the "sword" motive in the Wagnerian trilogy, by A. Ernst; and an exhaustive analytical and critical account of Leoncavallo's "I Medici," by R. Giani and A. Englefred, being among the most important contributions. There is also a number of excellent reviews of various musical publications and literary works, at the head of which stands a detailed and appreciative notice, with examples in music-type, of Cowen's "Water Lily." Useful lists of operatic and other productions, and of music lately published in Italy and elsewhere, are included in the number, which also contains references to some of the chief articles that have lately appeared in The Musical Times and several of the chief foreign musical journals. We trust the Rivista Musicale Italiana has before it a long and prosperous career.

Our contemporary, Musical News, points out that its duty is "to be the recorder of musical events of the day." Granted, and the decease of the Overture was quite rightly made a point of information in its columns. It is usual on such occasions to offer words of sympathy, and—de mortuis nil nisi bonum—to dwell upon the merits of the departed. But Musical News has chosen, for some reason or other, to perform a kind of scalp dance upon the new-made grave; calling attention to the late journal's "forced comic tone, often degenerating into vulgarity, and the strange 'high jeaks' (the word we have italicised is presumably one of our contemporary's frequent misprints) which lately characterised its pages." While deprecating this indecency, we are not called upon to defend the Overture. Mr. Frederick Corder can very well do that if, as is unlikely, he thinks it worth while. But it seems to us, from our knowledge of Musical News, that time and attention should be devoted to the removal of that journal's own defects rather than to castigation of a paper which, being dead, cannot hit back. No one, for instance, ever charged Musical News with humour, forced or spontaneous, while, as for vulgarity, the paragraph to which we now refer is a supreme and convincing example. By the way, our contemporary informs its readers in another paragraph that public appreciation of the work done by MM. Joachim and Piatti must be "a source of gratitude to these two artists." A cause of pride and satisfaction we can understand, but why gratitude? Nevertheless, gratitude is a good word. Again, our contemporary, referring to "the professor strict, the semi-professor, the semi-amateur," &c., sagely tells us that "culture and ability is not the exclusive prerogative of any one of these roughly defined classes." It may, however, be hoped that the privilege of writing "culture and ability is" belongs exclusively to Musical News.

Mr. F. H. Cowen and his most important works are so well known and appreciated abroad that the complete success of the Concert given under his direction by the Liszt Verein at Leipzig, on the 16th ult., will surprise no one. He conducted the entire Concert, which included his Symphony in F (No. 5) and the "Language of Flowers" Suite, besides Liszt's E flat Concerto and Hungarian Fantasia (pianist, Miss Remmert), and his "Mignon" Lied, sung by Miss Polscher. The Symphony pleased immensely, especially the Allegretto and Adagio — members of the orchestra and many musicians present asserting its superiority to the "Scandinavian" Symphony. Mr. Cowen's own preference, it may be mentioned, accords with this view. The Suite was also most enthusiastically received, and the Gavotte, as usual, encored. The composer was greatly pleased with the refinement and intelligence shown by the band, and with the cordiality of his reception. Writing recently to a friend, he said: "Altogether I have every reason to be gratified at my visit, and if only we could all do that sort of thing oftener, we should soon entirely remove the prejudice which has existed through ignorance but which is now on the wane." There is already a suggestion that Mr. Cowen should return in the winter and perhaps give a choral work. The Sterndale Bennett Society, to which we have already called attention in these columns, gave Mr. Cowen a reception, which was largely attended by English residents and students. The Allegretto and Adagio of the Symphony, by the way, were performed with great success a few days before Mr. Cowen's arrival.

We note with pleasure that arrangements have just been made to bring out, in a limited edition, and in monthly parts, the contents of the important MS. in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, usually, but erroneously, called "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book." Most musicians know that the MS. (fully described, with a list of contents, in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," Vol. IV., pp. 305 to 310, and in the Catalogue of the Music in the Fitzwilliam Museum, pp. 104 to 119) is the most valuable collection in existence of the earliest works for keyed instruments written in England by a group of famous composers of the sixteenth century; it contains compositions—290 in number—by William Blitheman, John Bull, William Byrd, John Dowland, Giles and Richard Farnaby, Orlando Gibbons, James Harding, — Hooper, William Inglott, Edward and Richard Johnson, — Marchant, Thomas Morley, John Munday, Thomas Oldfield, Jehan Oystermayre, Martin Peerson, — Persons, Peter Phillips, Giovanni Picchi, Ferdinando Richardson, Nicholas Strogers, Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck, Thomas Tallis, William Tisdall, Thomas Tomkins, and Thomas Warrock. The publication will be edited by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, M.A., F.S.A., and Mr. W. Barclay Squire, B.A., F.S.A. Nothing will be added or omitted, but the ordinary five-line staves will be substituted for the six-line staves of the MS. and the G and F clefs only will be used.

Although the reception given to Joseph Joachim and Alfredo Piatti, in honour of the fiftieth anniversary of their appearance in England, took place too late for extended notice in our present issue, we cannot allow a whole month to pass before placing on record an event unique in our musical annals, and congratulating those who brought it about on the brilliant result achieved. Since the reception of Liszt in 1886 no such gathering has been seen as that which assembled at the Grafton Galleries on the 22nd ult., to do honour to these two distinguished musicians. The Committee itself included all the most eminent names in the profession, with Sir George Grove and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie as Chairmen, and Mr. Hermann Klein as honorary secretary; and the Sister Arts were represented by names known all over the world. Of the guests, who were so numerous that they can only be described as a crowd, there were few without artistic distinction. The formal proceedings were brief, but marked by a degree of reverence as fitting as, now-a-days, it is rare. Dr. Mackenzie and Sir George Grove read short addresses of congratulation to the heroes of the occasion, in which their services to Art were warmly and gratefully acknowledged, and each made response in words characteristically modest and unaffected. While they spoke the great gathering stood—composers, conductors, singers, players, and critics uniting in homage and testfying to the abiding influence of true nobility in art.

The recent production of Mr. Cowen's "Signa" has naturally drawn attention to the novel on which the opera is founded. One of our readers, who has just read Ouida's book, sends us an extract from page 240 as a contribution to our "Museum of Musical Curiosities." Bruno has stamped upon and of course smashed to pieces Signa's violin. The boy sits up all night trying to mend it; but, says Ouida, "it was quite useless. The wooden shell he could piece together well enough; but the keys were smashed beyond all chance of restoration, and for the broken silvery strings there was no hope. The Rusignuolo was mute for evermore, as mute as a dead bird." Our correspondent asks, "Can it be possible that Ouida thinks a violin is played by means of a keyboard, or that Signa up to that time had played his instrument without having ever broken a string?"

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Not long ago the connection between Cowper's poem on the loss of the Royal George and the March in Handel's "Scipio" was mentioned in this journal. I have since received from Mr. Herbert W. L. Rumsey a very interesting letter on the same subject. This communication is, I regret to say, too long for reproduction as it stands, but the more important parts can be dealt with. Mr. Rumsey quotes from "Sea Sketches about Ships and Sailors"—a small volume published anonymously and without date at the Leisure Hour office. It is pointed out that the writer of the extract gives no authority for his statement, but, as it is in substantial agreement with other accounts of the same incident, I am disposed to accept it as a narrative of facts.

The statement begins with a well-drawn picture of a gloomy day, the atmosphere laden with rain and mist, and Cowper pacing his room, agitated and gloomy, and stepping to the theme of the March hummed by himself. After this artistic beginning, the writer proceeds:

Suddenly his door flew open, and in rushed a lady, holding in her hand an open newspaper, in which she had just been reading the account of the loss of the Royal George. Greatly excited at the melancholy news, she exclaimed: "Oh! Mr. Cowper, have you heard of the dreadful accident which has happened? The Royal George has gone down into the sea with 800 men on board, and every soul has perished!" Cowper, wrapped up in his own reflections, paid no attention either to her or her story, but continued to walk on backwards and forwards; the catastrophe, as may well be imagined, appeared to her a very fearful one, and hence she wondered at his not being moved by it. Thinking that perhaps he had not heard what she had told him, she repeated the account in fuller detail. . . . Still Cowper took not the least notice. . . . Hence she concluded that he was determined not to listen to her, and therefore left the room.

Nevertheless, though Cowper had manifested no sign that the melancholy news had produced any impression on him, he was deeply affected. The story had, as the sequel will show, reached his mind, but it had not yet touched his heart. Though he abounded to overflowing with sympathy for the distress of others, so much was he absorbed in his own misery, that he was entirely carried away for the time by it. . . . At that instant the bell of the church close by began to toll for a funeral. The unexpected sound, and the solemnity of the associations connected with it, wrought a sudden change in him. Each stroke as it boomed forth was to him like the thrust of a sword. The chord that united him to his fellow man was now reached, and vibrated to the touch. . . . Roused to a state of intense excitement, he could restrain himself no longer, but seized a pen, and gave vent to his feelings in these deeply solemn and exquisite lines, the measure of which corresponds to the music of Handel's March.

Mr. Rumsey follows up his citation by remarking: "Students of the poet's works must surely know if this account is reliable, and perhaps they will give their less learned brothers the benefit of their knowledge."

After a season of comparatively good behaviour the printer's boy, moved, perhaps, by the advance of spring and a general recrudescence of life, has become frisky again. I note his doings in the office of a certain Irish journal with severe reprobation. Having got hold—in the dinner-hour probably—of a Concert notice, the young rascal set to work and mutilated most of the proper names. Gregory Hast he transformed into Gregory Host (that may be intended as a compliment meaning "a host in himself"). Grace Damian came out as Grace Domian, and Tivadar Nachèz as Tivadar Mackey. Augustus Barratt appeared as Agustus Barratt, and, unkindest cut of all, Mr. Johannes Wolff was actually transformed into a lady under the name of Miss Johanness Wolff. Let us hope that this practical joker was well spanked for his pains.

A Lincolnshire paper prints a letter in which the writer is made to state that he had been invited to send a contingent to the Crystal Palace to assist at a Concert of 5,000 voices "on the handle orchestra at the National Temperance fate." That boy again!

Noticing some remarks on the English of musical reporters which appeared in these columns last month, and especially on the "uncouth coinages" made to avoid repetitions of the same word, the Globe says: "But repetition, in all its unmitigated baldness, is preferable to the enormities ('rendition' and such like) described above." With that opinion I am in thorough agreement. My object was, not to excuse the "uncouth coinages" so much as to indicate the circumstances which, apparently, give rise to them.

I have a letter from Mr. G. W. Bettany, of Burton-on-Trent, with reference to the use of orchestral instruments in the service of the Church, and, more particularly, as regards their employment in accompanying the chanting of the Psalms. A short time ago I advised that these instruments should be heard only in the "Gloria Patri." As to this, Mr. Bettany writes:

I venture to acquaint you with the fact (which possibly may interest you) that for nearly six months in 1891, while the organ at Holy Trinity Church in our town of Burton-on-Trent was undergoing enlargement and repairs, an orchestra of over thirty performers took its place and accompanied the Sunday services. It was my great pleasure to conduct this orchestra, and the pleasure with which I recollect our rendering of the Psalms induces me to claim that the orchestra (however rightly it can be deemed an unadvisable use of it) can accompany the Psalms, and can be made the vehicle of expression suitable to them.

With regard to the difficulty presented by the often prolonged reciting note, Mr. Bettany observes:

No doubt, at times, it taxed our wind players, but there was always sufficient string tone sounding, and if the performers accommodated themselves to a pp, or took breath during its continuance, it only served to display the voices, and the effect was not a bit the worse.

I am glad to learn that so much success attended the experiment at Burton, but must point out that my remarks as to restricting the use of the orchestra assumed an organ to be available. Where, as in the case mentioned by my correspondent, there is no organ, the orchestra must, of course, do its best, which, in the Trent-side town, means something very good indeed. The band conducted by Mr. Bettany comprised fourteen violins, two violas, three violoncelli, two double-basses, a flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, a bassoon, cornet, trombone, and euphonium. In addition, there were seven auxiliary performers. Well done, Burton!

A correspondent sends me a sheet of four large pages (yellow flimsy) in which is set forth the advantages of So-and-so's new method of teaching the pianoforte—a method which, if we may believe what is said about it, can claim to be the "royal road" found at last. So-and-so

Begs respectfully to make known the fact, and honestly intimate, that through the medium of his NEW AND EASY METHOD, ANY PERSON OF 60 YEARS or under, with but little time to waste, CAN ENSURE (quite apart from talent) A THOROUGH THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE, together with 20 to 30 cheerful tunes IN ONE QUARTER, although totally unpossessed of the slightest knowledge of music, AND WHOLLY IGNORANT OF THE INSTRUMENT.

So let us cry "Eureka!" Where children are concerned, the inventor drops into poetry, and says or sings:

Ye young ones you have your wee little cares,
Your own little troubles and your own little scares;
You must of course squall when, quite unawares,
You roll from the top to the foot of the stairs.
You must of course cry, and thus beautify
The side of your face, which has dust in poor eye.
You must feel it hard if perchance you knocked heads,
With that clumsy Bobby or against brother Fred's.
You must think it cruel when you try, try, try,
To learn quickly, yet can but cry, cry and why?
Because the dry exercise and the horrid old scale,
Is made O so ugly and that's why you fail;
But now dry your eyes, all such griefs are past,
AN EASY NEW TEACHING is invented at last.

Lest the mind should unduly dwell upon the new discovery, and work itself harm by excess of rapture, the pamphlet is charged with such varied information as that the people of Madagascar eat fried silk-worms, while those of New Caledonia are fond of roasted spiders.

I am in receipt of a second letter from the Rev. W. E. Stebbing, of Morpeth, on the subject of glaringly inefficient musical criticisms. It contains a suggestion which deserves publicity:—

My experience is that in most towns there are people who could do the work very much better. In quiet country towns there are often doctors, lawyers, parsons, or other private persons with whom music is a favourite hobby. Sometimes they know a great deal about it and are competent scholars on the subject. I have found several who could write most intelligently upon musical subjects, and I believe many more exist. To take a typical instance. I know a Lancashire cotton town (40,000 inhabitants) very well, where a member of a brewing firm has one of the best musical libraries in the county and is a man of high intelligence in matters musical. Two other gentlemen, cotton spinners, and a well established doctor are also capable critics. This is quite a sufficient number for such a town as I have in my mind, and such conditions will be found to exist proportionally in most quarters. Could not editors of papers be persuaded to ask gentlemen of this sort to provide them with careful criticisms, and dispense with the incompetent office boy or man from henceforth?

Persons acquainted with the conditions of modern journalism will easily put their finger upon the weak point in the above suggestion. An editor would have but little control over amateur contributors, and they, being men of business, would often find themselves unable to attend to the work of musical criticism. But a newspaper, in these days, must be served, and served promptly, or it drops behind. Still the plan might be found workable in certain cases, and to that extent prove of value.

Taken from a Concert-notice published in a Manchester paper: "The pair actually returned and gave the last verse of Sullivan's pretty duet, but we think Mr. Langton Griffiths would have done well to have seen the audience 'blowed' first, as they somewhat inelegantly put it in these parts. But to return to our muttons." Inelegance seems to be catching.

It has now been decided that Mr. Henschel's Scottish Orchestra shall appear at only four of next season's London Symphony Concerts, metropolitan performers being engaged for the remaining four. This arrangement happily preserves the connection between the Conductor and the London artists who have served him so long and well. I have reason to know that the prospect of a severance was a source of pain to Mr. Henschel, but, at one time, there appeared to be no alternative.

Not much space will be given in this department of The Musical Times to what is called the "encore nuisance." Those who put lance in rest as opponents of encores are tilting against the wind. Time after time, within my recollection, have onslaughts been made upon a vicious custom, but it flourishes as rankly as ever. The reason is that the conditions of vitality are always with us, and not only with us but rooted in human nature. It is more an instinct than a principle which prompts us to get all we can for our money, and, as artists, to court the favour of the public and encourage its manifestation. When the leopard changes his spots we may look for the rise of a popular sentiment, in auditorium and on platform, against the present system.

At least one order of musical practitioners appears to be making a good thing of life. A correspondent of the Globe states that an Italian organ-grinder lately admitted in a police-court that, in thirty-eight weeks, he had earned enough to put by £30 for himself and as much for his daughter, besides taking a pleasure trip to Naples. Unless we assume that the money was given as a bribe to go and play round the corner, it must be admitted (pace Mrs. Ormiston Chant) that the street organ is a popular instrument.

A man in America declares that the barrel organ is not a frivolous or painful machine, but an educational implement having an extensive influence. He happens to be a barrel organ maker.

I learn from an advertisement in a Norfolk paper that a certain professor in that county gives two lessons a week, on the pianoforte or harmonium, for ninepence! It may be that the lessons are worth no more, in which case the modesty of the professor is most exemplary.

The biography of the late J. W. Davison, upon which his elder son, Mr. Henry Davison, is at present engaged, will be a permanent memorial of a remarkable man. But if those who have departed from us are permitted to know what events are happening in their old home, it is tolerably certain that there is one distressed shade amongst them. Davison had a rooted aversion from the idea of writing his reminiscences, or preparing materials for a "Life." I have the best reason for knowing this, because during the many years of our intimate association as colleagues and friends, I frequently urged him to let the world have the benefit of his recollections, and of the shrewd observations upon men and things with which he so often delighted me. Nothing could induce him to look at the matter seriously, and when I offered to undertake the literary part of the work if he would provide and arrange the materials, the reply was that he hoped I had something better to do with my time.

It is not well that the dead should bind their successors, and I am glad that Mr. Henry Davison proposes to snatch from the limbo of old newspapers and periodicals the finest efforts of his father's pen, to print a selection from the many interesting letters received by this powerful critic in the course of his long career, and to particularise the more important events and circumstances of his life. The work will be published in two volumes.

The last Popular Concert of the season was marked by intense enthusiasm for the two great artists, Joachim and Piatti, who have so long been the mainstay of Mr. Chappell's enterprise. A more satisfactory jubilee celebration could not be imagined, because there was nothing of organisation about it, but simply a spontaneous expression of feeling in which both admiration and gratitude found place.

"A Musical Student" tells me of a Prayer Book in the possession of her father, which is embellished with marginal wood-cuts, and contains, vis-à-vis with the Psalms, a number of groups representing the Dance of Death. She points out that in this series are various references to music and musical instruments and also attendant couplets, such as "Drummer call together All soldiers to my banner." The book of which my correspondent speaks is, no doubt, Pickering's reprint (1853) of "The First Book of Queen Elizabeth: The Boke of Common Praier, &c. London. In Officina Richardi Grafton, 1559." A beautiful and spotless copy of the reprint is in my library, and "A Musical Student" is thanked as being the means of directing my attention to it.

I see that the Times continues its very disparaging remarks upon Gounod's "Redemption." It speaks of the music as "painfully at variance with the sacredness of the text," and of the parts sung at the Crystal Palace by Messrs. Lloyd and Bispham as "tedious." The Times has a right to its opinion and to the expression thereof as often as may seem advisable. We who have different views about the "Redemption" do not complain, but when we read: "With the strains of the immortal Passion Music according to St. Matthew still ringing in one's ears it is impossible not to feel the great difference that exists between the real inspiration of the one work and the false ring of the other," it seems needful to point out that comparisons of the music of to-day with that of 150 years ago—music differing as much in regard of nationality and temperament as in point of time—are not very scientific. It is fortunate that many of us do not condemn Gounod's sacred masterpiece because we account the Matthew "Passion" a chef-d'œuvre.

Joseph Bennett.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Gounod's second and last sacred trilogy, "Mors et Vita," includes, as musicians are aware, a complete and extremely impressive setting of the Requiem Mass. This may be detached with ease from the rest of the work, and it was given at the Albert Hall, under Sir Joseph Barnby's direction, on the 1st ult., in association with Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Rather curiously, the performance did not attract as much attention as might have been expected, the attendance being under the average. But if the large building was not well filled, the enthusiasm of those present was quite refreshing to notice—that is to say, in the "Stabat Mater," for of course Gounod's solemn strains were received in becoming silence. As regards the performance, it may be said, in the first place, that Sir Joseph Barnby's magnificent choir was well up to its usual mark, alike in the French and in the Italian master's work. The names of the principal performers were perhaps, as a body, not sufficiently familiar to be attractive; but it should be placed on record that they all fulfilled their duties to the full satisfaction of the audience. Mrs. Elene Eaton's powerful soprano voice told well in the immense hall; Miss Marie Brema and Mr. Watkin Mills sang in their customary artistic manner, both being in good voice; and a very favourable impression was created by Mr. von Bandrowski, a tenor from Frankfort. He was especially applauded for his impressive rendering of "Cujus animam," which still remains one of the most popular solo pieces for tenor voice.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This Society began its eighty-second season in Queen's Hall on February 28, when—and also at the second Concert, on the 14th ult.—was performed the last Symphony and the last important work of Tschaikowsky, whose death, a few weeks after its production in the Russian capital, caused such general regret throughout the world of art. By one of those strange coincidences which are not infrequent, the Symphony, written in the full vigour of health, is styled "Pathetic," and ends with a movement as sad and funereal as anything in music. All unconsciously, the master here prepared his own dirge. The work makes some bold innovations upon established form. Thus the slow movement, usually placed second, stands fourth and last. A short introduction, and an opening Allegro, are followed by an Allegro con grazia in Scherzo form; an Allegro molto vivace, also in Scherzo form, but much elaborated, and the whole ends with an Adagio lamentoso. There is no reason to think that the composer intended this arrangement as a model. It is, without doubt, an exceptional case suggested by the specific character of the Symphony, the composer determining that the final impression made by the music should justify his use of the term "pathetic." We need not, therefore, spend much time in pointing out that the association of three quick movements in consecutive order is undesirable, or that the plan usually followed is, on many accounts, the best. Another novel feature of the work is found in the opening Allegro, where the leading subject is marked Allegro non troppo, and the second theme Andante, where, also, there are other changes of tempo, making the number six in all. The movement, however, though containing much episodical matter, is in the accepted form. Here then we have an enlargement of the scope of a first movement, and a model which composers are not at all unlikely to work from. Each case must, of course, be judged on its merits, but we see no objection to the model as such—one which the Russian master has made specially interesting and effective by elaborate working and highly-effective contrasts. The second movement is perfectly simple and tuneful; the third is long and of complicated detail, sonorous and, so to speak, enthusiastic; while the fourth, like the first, presents various changes of tempo, ranging from Adagio to Vivace. Obviously such a Symphony is one for careful review, with the advantage of music-type illustrations, rather than for exhaustive discussion in a general notice such as this. Dr. Mackenzie conducted the fine work with obvious sympathy, and both performances were really triumphs of interpretation, on which let all concerned be heartily congratulated. We make no reflection upon Conductor or orchestra when we say that the second performance was much better than the first. Music so elaborate, and, in some respects, so new, cannot be conquered in the short time ordinarily devoted to rehearsal for a single occasion. Other orchestral selections in the programme of the first Concert were Goldmark's Overture "Sakuntala" and Weber's to "Oberon." The pianist of the evening, Mr. Borwick, distinguished himself greatly in Beethoven's fifth Concerto, though there was a slight falling off in the last movement. Grieg's long and not uniformly interesting Ballade in G minor seemed to us an injudicious choice. Mr. Borwick, however, played them very well indeed.

At the second Concert, the closing Overture was Smetana's "Lustspiel," the Concerto being again one for pianoforte—Beethoven's in G (No. 4). Miss Fanny Davies's share in the execution of this fine work was a brilliant contribution to one of the best ensembles in Philharmonic records. Never, to our knowledge, has she shown herself more highly qualified for a task demanding the highest attributes of an artist. Her effort, alike in technique and spirit, was most convincing. Good, also, was Mr. Sauret's performance of Dr. Mackenzie's "Pibroch," the difficulties being easily surmounted by that accomplished violinist. Madame de Vere-Sapio appeared as vocalist, another American, Miss Ella Russell, having filled the post at the opening Concert.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Henschel's sixth and seventh Concerts of his present season may be said to have decidedly increased his reputation as a Conductor. At the first of these, on February 22, a remarkably vigorous and stirring rendering was given of Schumann's fine D minor Symphony (No. 4), and equally effective performances of the Prelude to the third act of the "Meistersingers" and Overture to "Tannhäuser." An especially interesting feature of this Concert was the inclusion in the programme of Brahms's seldom heard Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus, and orchestra, the dramatic solo part in which was magnificently declaimed by Miss Marie Brema, and the chorus parts impressively sung by the male members of Mr. Henschel's choir. Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (Op. 73), the solo part of which was brilliantly played by Miss Ilona Eibenschütz, made up an attractive programme.

At the seventh Concert, given on the 8th ult., the Symphony was Beethoven's in C minor (No. 5), the impetuous energy of which was most happily expressed. This was followed by a Concerto for violin and orchestra in C, by Moszkowski, a work remarkable for the melodious beauty of its themes and the opportunities it affords for the display of the abilities of the executant of its solo part. As this was entrusted to Mr. Sauret, and as the orchestral portion had evidently received careful rehearsal, a very effective performance of the work was given. The Prelude to "Lohengrin" and Beethoven's third "Leonore" Overture were also finely played, and Mrs. Henschel's charming singing of "Und ob die Wolke," from "Der Freischütz," and her husband's fanciful "Spring" song, which on this occasion was furnished with a dainty orchestral accompaniment, completed one of the most enjoyable Concerts Mr. Henschel has yet given us, and which attracted an exceptionally large audience.

THE BACH CHOIR.

Perhaps one of the most remarkable features in connection with the history of music in England is the growth in popularity of the great works of John Sebastian Bach within the memory of the present generation. The marvellous setting of the Passion according to St. Matthew was favoured by the late Prince Consort, but public opinion and taste were not ripe for its general performance until it was given at the Oratorio Concerts in 1870, and few, if any, who were then present at the first performance, under the direction of Sir Joseph (then Mr.) Barnby, can have forgotten the remarkable impression created by the antique music, the power and beauty of which proved irresistible. It was then heard with wonderful effect at a Special Service in Westminster Abbey in 1871, and again in 1874, both times under the direction of Mr. Barnby. After this the work was heard frequently at St. James's, Exeter, and the Albert Halls, and, if we remember rightly, it was in the last-named building—where it was given no fewer than four times during Holy Week in 1873—that the audience was for the first time asked to rise and join in the chorales. It was repeated in the years immediately following, and a condensed version is performed annually at St. Paul's Cathedral, on the Tuesday in Holy Week. A cheap octavo edition was promptly issued in vocal score by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and this has been extensively employed; but the same firm has now published a new edition, with the English words revised and the notes of the recitatives given precisely as in the original. This latest version was, we understand, prepared in the first instance for Mr. Henschel, who contemplated a performance during the present season, but this will have to stand over until next year. The Bach Choir, ever in earnest, made praiseworthy and special endeavours to render the Matthew Passion music in worthy fashion at the performance in the Queen's Hall, on the 15th ult. It is of course better to show too much artistic endeavour than too little, but the well-meant use of the original German text was evidently embarrassing to the choir, the singing being feebler and more uncertain than at any previous Concert of this estimable Association within our remembrance. With regard to the length of the performance, it should be remembered that in Bach's day it commenced early in the morning, and that a lengthy interval was allowed between the parts, in this respect resembling the Bayreuth performances and that of the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau at the present time. These conditions are, of course, impossible in London, and the Bach Choir certainly merit approval for giving the Passion music with so few curtailments. Mr. Robert Kaufmann, who had been specially engaged for the arduous part of the Evangelist, attacked the high notes with apparent ease, his voice being a counter-tenor of fair quality and his method distinctly German. Mr. Norman Salmond was unfortunately out of voice; but excellent service was rendered by Miss Fillunger, Miss Marie Brema, and Mr. David Bispham. Mr. Joachim played the violin obbligati, Miss Hélène Dolmetsch the part for viola da gamba, Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. F. Cliffe at the organ. Professor Villiers Stanford, in his conducting, showed intimate acquaintance with the score. The performance is to be repeated next season.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

In the programme of the thirteenth Saturday Concert, held on the 3rd ult., room was found for a novelty from the pen of Mr. Walter Wesché, in the shape of an Orchestral Ballad entitled "The Legend of Excalibur." From the very sensible remarks of the composer in the programme book, we gather that in regard to "programme" music he is in accord with Beethoven, and, to quote Dr. Hubert Parry's happy phrase, has no intention of "trying to make people see with their ears." Of Mr. Wesché's music we regret to be unable to speak with any enthusiasm. His themes are unimpressive, nor are they redeemed by any special ingenuity or resourcefulness of treatment. The second subject, in waltz rhythm, is of a trivial character, and the concluding portion of the work is marred by a great deal of tedious repetition. A friendly reception was bestowed on the Ballad, and the composer bowed his acknowledgments from the platform. Herr Hugo Becker, the instrumentalist of the afternoon, won great favour by his masterly breadth of tone and phrasing in Haydn's cheerful Violoncello Concerto in D, and gave further proofs of his remarkable accomplishments as an executant in two agreeable trifles of his own composition, as well as in Schumann's "Träumerei." Mdlle. Rose Olitzka, a contralto who has done good service of late seasons with the Royal Carl Rosa Company, sang Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido," with considerable feeling and knowledge of effect, and maintained the favourable impression by her rendering of Lieder by Grieg and Schumann. Wagner's fine "Faust" Overture, Beethoven's First Symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes," all admirably played under Mr. Manns's direction, completed the programme.

Dr. Joachim was the central figure at the Concert of the 10th ult., the great violinist appearing on this occasion in the character of a composer as well as that of an executant. His "Elegiac" Overture, composed as an act of homage to the storm-tossed career of the brilliant but unhappy German poet, Heinrich von Kleist, was produced for the first time at Cambridge in March, 1877, on the evening of the day on which the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred on Dr. Joachim; and the very interesting analysis then contributed by Sir George Macfarren was appropriately reproduced in the Crystal Palace programme book. The Overture, we may add, is an admirable expression in music of the emotions which might be expected to spring from a contemplation of the career and character of Von Kleist, and thoroughly justifies its title of "Elegiac." Dr. Joachim's principal solo was Brahms's Violin Concerto, for the interpretation of which the union of those qualities of head and heart which characterises Dr Joachim's playing fit him in a pre-eminent degree. Later on he gave Beethoven's beautiful Romance in F, with incomparable beauty of tone and poetry of expression. The orchestra, which accompanied Dr. Joachim in excellent style, gave a remarkably fine rendering of Raff's "Lenore" Symphony, a work which, though at times undistinguished and verging even on the trivial, is so vividly coloured, so full of emotion and romance, that these drawbacks may be readily overlooked. The vocalist of the afternoon, Miss Florence Monteith, a débutante at these Concerts, has a light but pleasing soprano voice which shows signs of having been carefully trained. Her rendering of the cantilène from Gounod's "Cinq Mars," "Nuit resplendissante," suffered from her obvious nervousness, but she was much more successful in a song, "The wild flower," by Franco Leoni. Mr. Manns conducted throughout with his wonted intelligence and ability.

Gounod's "Redemption" was given at the Concert of the 17th ult., "in reverential memory of the composer," and no pains were spared by all concerned to make the performance worthy the occasion. The cast of principals comprised Miss Ella Russell, Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Marian McKenzie, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and David Bispham, of whom the two last-named artists especially distinguished themselves by the expressiveness and sympathy of their performance. The Crystal Palace Choir was heard to marked advantage in the grateful music which fell to its lot, while the orchestra, under Mr. Manns's inspiriting guidance, acquitted itself in irreproachable fashion.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Our record of the thirty-sixth season of these Concerts, which has been one of the most prosperous for several years, may now be finished, and it will not be necessary to deal with the concluding performances at any great length. That of Saturday, February 24, which is the first we have to mention, included Cherubini's fine Quartet in D minor (No. 3), Beethoven's melodious Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin (Op. 30, No. 1), Gade's Capriccio in A minor for violin, for which Mr. Joachim accepted an encore, and the whole of Schumann's Kreisleriana (Op. 16), which were beautifully interpreted by Miss Fanny Davies. Madame Alice Gomez, save for indistinctness in enunciation, was commendable in songs by Goring Thomas and Tschaikowsky.

Equally brief notice will suffice for the Concert of the following Monday. Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, magnificently played, as on many previous occasions, by Lady Hallé and Mr. Joachim, sufficed to account for the unusually large audience; and in response to the prolonged applause the two artists repeated the beautiful slow movement in F. Mozart's Quartet in G (No. 1), of the set dedicated to Haydn, and Rubinstein's Three Pieces for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 11) were the remaining concerted numbers, and the pianoforte solo was Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), of which Miss Eibenschütz gave a very vigorous if not a very poetical reading. The vocalist was Miss Dale, a young soprano, who appeared at short notice and displayed a sweet and well-trained voice in airs by Lassen, Schumann, and Grieg.

On Saturday, the 3rd ult., a Beethoven programme drew an enormous audience, the instrumental works selected being the Quintet in C (Op. 29), the early Pianoforte Sonata in E flat (Op. 7), played with all needful delicacy by Miss Fanny Davies, and the "Kreutzer" Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Op. 47). Miss Fillunger sang with acceptance three of the Bonn master's Lieder.

The Concert of Monday, the 5th ult., included a novelty. This was Dvorák's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 21), one of the Bohemian composer's earliest and least distinctive chamber works, though, of course, worthy of a hearing. It is marked by rigid economy in the use of thematic material and is perfectly clear in outline, though the themes are not remarkable for freshness. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, the pianist on this occasion, gave some pieces by Scarlatti, and Mr. Joachim four movements from Bach's Sonata in E for violin, unaccompanied. Why the fifth was not played it is impossible to say, as the omission only resulted in an irresistible demand for an encore. Schubert's glorious Quintet in C (Op. 163), which is not heard very frequently, perhaps on account of its length, opened the Concert, and Miss Dale was again the vocalist, singing airs by Mendelssohn, Schubert, and Schumann with much charm, and firmly resisting all demands for more.

On the following Saturday three of Thalberg's Six Pianoforte Studies were introduced for the first time by Miss Eibenschütz. Schumann summed up the qualities of these pieces very well in describing them as containing nothing new, and as salon studies, agreeable and playable, but not poetical. Having heard them once we have no great desire to hear them a second time. The concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2) and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), by desire, both being led by Lady Hallé, Mr. Joachim being engaged at the Crystal Palace. Mr. Santley introduced six musicianly songs by Mrs. Ellen Wright; and Locatelli's Violin Sonata in D, as adapted for the violoncello by Mr. Piatti, and of course played by him, completed the programme.

There are few more popular modern chamber works than Brahms's String Sextet in B flat (Op. 18), and it was received with enthusiasm on Monday, the 12th ult., the brief and vivacious Scherzo being encored. Mr. Schönberger gave an effective reading of Chopin's Ballade in F major (not F minor as printed) and, although recalled three times, declined to play again. Pianists may be encouraged in the movement, commenced none too soon, not to take an encore as a matter of course. Mr. Joachim played Tartini's somewhat threadbare Sonata "Il Trillo del Diavolo," and Mr. Schönberger and Mr. Piatti joined in the three numbers of Schumann's "Stücke im Volkston" for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 102), which, apparently, are alone among the set deemed worthy of performance at these Concerts, as they have been heard many times while the others have never been heard at all. Those charming duet singers, Miss Schidrowitz and Miss Zagury, were much applauded in selections by Rubinstein, Schumann, and Auber.

The last Saturday performance took place on the 17th ult., with an attractive but familiar programme, which may be dismissed in the briefest terms. Beethoven's Quartet in F minor (Op. 95), his great Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 97), and three movements from Spohr's Duo Concertante in D for two violins, unaccompanied (Op. 67, not 97 as printed), were the concerted pieces; and Mr. Leonard Borwick revived Mozart's beautiful and masterly Sonata in D, generally known as No. 21. In the absence of Miss Dale through illness, Miss Glwadys Wood was acceptable as the vocalist.

There was a great crowd in St. James's Hall at the final Concert of the season on the following Monday, and Messrs. Joachim and Piatti received a more than usually cordial greeting, the audience evidently having in view the approaching celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of their first appearance in London. The great violinist played four of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, with a fifth for an encore, and the equally great violoncellist two movements by Veracini. Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat (Op. 87), Schumann's in E flat (Op. 44), and Saint-Saëns's very clever variations on a theme from Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3)—the last-named work being played to perfection by Miss Zimmermann and Mr. Borwick—were in the programme; and Mr. Bispham was unexceptionable as the vocalist. Thus the season came to a triumphant conclusion.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The Concert given on the afternoon of February 22 opened with a new Pianoforte Quartet in D minor, by H. Walford Davies, whose compositions we have on previous occasions referred to as displaying a talent considerably above the average to be expected from "clever" students. The Quartet contains some capital themes and good workmanship, the elaborate Finale, Largo (quasi-Ciaconna)—molto allegro, returning to Ciaconna—Presto—to quote its full designation, being an especially praiseworthy effort. The work was played by the composer and Messrs. Charles Jacoby, William Ackroyd, and Paul Ludwig.

At the Orchestral Concert of the 7th ult., which took place in the enormous "temporary" hall of the Imperial Institute, an audience numbering several thousands listened to a programme which seemed to have been drawn up with a view to just such an Imperial Institute audience. It contained Beethoven's most rollicking Symphony, the delicious No. 8; Bizet's charmingly naïve and refined little Suite, "Jeux d'Enfants"; Saint-Saëns's catchy Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin, very creditably played by Miss Jessie Grimson; and two airs from Verdi's "Aïda" and Gounod's "Reine de Saba," which were sung by Miss Rina Allerton and Mr. Herbert Hilton respectively. The remaining number was Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's first Scotch Rhapsody (Op. 21), a delightful work—fresh, breezy, and stirring in its Allegro movements; tender and affecting in the beautiful poetic Adagio molto—one of those instrumentral pieces, in fact, which seem to give cause for regret that its gifted author has done so little during the last decade in the field of purely orchestral music, for which he possesses such special qualifications. The playing of the students' orchestra was good, though it did not altogether reach the standard attained at some previous Concerts. Professor Stanford conducted.

Particular interest was attached to the annual examination performance of the operatic class, which took place on the 12th ult., in the West Theatre of the Royal Albert Hall, the work chosen being Weber's refined and amusing Singspiel "Abu Hassan," which has not been heard in London since the Italian opera season at Drury Lane of 1870, when Madame Trebelli took the part of the impecunious hero, Hassan, and Madame Monbelli that of the heroine, Fatima. On the 12th ult. these characters were respectively sustained by Mr. McLeod Jones and Miss Ena Bedford, both of whom displayed promising abilities. The part of the amorous money lender was played with a completeness seldom seen at such performances by Mr. Alfred W. Clark, who, under the name of Mr. Henry Bouchier, recently made a remarkably successful début as Captain Crook in Mr. H. Talbot's comic opera "Wapping Old Stairs." The other characters were taken by Miss Beatrice Pratt, Miss Dora Barrington, Mr. Francis Harford, and Mr. William Maynard. The choruses were brightly and intelligently sung, and the accompaniments and incidental pieces, which, by the way, often suggest Mozart's "Figaro," were excellently played by the College orchestra, under the conductorship of Professor Stanford.

The last Students' Concert at Alexandra House previous to the Easter vacation was given on the 15th ult. The most important work in the programme was Brahms's Sextet, No. 1, in B flat (Op. 18), which received an excellent interpretation, for which Miss Jessie Grimson and Miss Alice Elieson are especially entitled to praise. A very creditable performance was also given of Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), which was led by Miss Marie Motto; and Miss Helen Taylor gave a neat rendering of a Nocturne for violoncello, by Goltermann. The vocalists were Miss Maude Pierpoint and Miss Kirby Lunn. The former was apparently too nervous to do herself justice; the latter possesses a powerful contralto voice, and gave satisfactory proof of having received admirable training.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Brief notice is all that is desirable concerning the two Concerts held in St. James's Hall, which come within our present survey. The first, on February 26, was a chamber performance, perhaps the best feature being a Sonata in E for pianoforte and violin, by Miss Llewela Davies (Macfarren Scholar), which was admirably played by Miss Gertrude Collins and the composer. It is a brightly written and generally effective work, above the average of student's efforts. An anthem, "God is our hope," by Mr. George F. Mott (student), was well sung; but the tiresome repetitions of words were rather suggestive of a past age. Other pieces worthy of mention were Haydn's "Evening Prayer" for chorus, which it was stated was performed for the first time in England; three violin movements by Lalo, well played by Miss Nettie Atkinson; and "Sÿnnove's Song," by Kjerulf, in which Miss Marion Evans displayed a pretty voice and much artistic promise. The usual Lenten orchestral performance was given on the afternon of the 20th ult., the programme commencing with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," which was vigorously played by a force of ninety executants, the majority being either students or ex-students. The female choir was charming in the piquant Chorus of Witches, "Whither away," from Professor Stanford's cantata "The Voyage of Maeldune," and Miss Lily West displayed considerable proficiency, though, perhaps, incommensurate power, in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor. A very pleasing Concertstück in C minor for harp and orchestra, by a German composer little known in this country, named N. von Wilm, enabled Miss A. M. E. Carnes to evince much promise on her beautiful instrument; and among other students may be named in encouraging terms Miss Alice Simons, soprano and Parepa-Rosa Scholar, and Miss Gertrude Collins, violinist.

The weekly Lectures to students at the Royal Academy during the past month have been of more than usual value and interest. Professor Bridge has lectured twice: on the first occasion, the early history of dramatic music was treated and the progress of the Masque traced up to the time of Milton's "Comus." Many quaint and humorous extracts from the old writers were read, and several beautiful old settings of the songs of the period sung by Mr. A. Collard, Mr. Dan Price, and some of the Westminster Choirboys. On the 7th ult. Dr. Bridge repeated, with the aid of Westminster Abbey Chorister Boys, his Gresham Lecture explanatory of his musical gestures, as set forth in one of the series of Novello Primers noticed in The Musical Times for February last. The ingenious system met with the liveliest appreciation at the Academy, and there can be little doubt but that the occasion will be a memorable one for very many of the students, and will prove the origin of similar associative gesticulations by a vast army of "good little souls in nice white stoles," and others far and wide. On the 14th ult. Mr. E. F. Jacques began a series of four Lectures, the first two of which, at the special request of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, were devoted to Æsthetics. The importance of the Principal's request can scarcely be over-estimated. Few subjects are less understood by students—and even by cultured musicians—than those included under the by no means satisfactory term "Æsthetics"; indeed, by many they are regarded as practically useless. Those, however, who attended these discourses were presented with a series of hard facts and close reasonings that quickly showed the subject to be no vague speculation, but one of great practical utility, and one, upon their thorough comprehension of which would depend no small part of their future success as composers, performers, teachers, or mere listeners. The line of argument pursued was, that the active powers of mankind were employed in "doing" and "knowing." From the former there resulted the various arts; from the latter the various sciences. Art dictated what was best to do, science supplied the reason why, and each helped the other. It was quite true science could not make a great artist, but it could help him, and much more those who were not born great. The highest results ensued when genius was married to science. It was most necessary to distinguish that which went on outside us and that which went on inside us—in other words, to distinguish between that which was objective and that which was subjective. In listening to an orchestra, for instance, outside us there only existed aërial vibrations; these only became sound by their action inside our heads. Hence the effect a composer's music made upon us was largely dependent upon our receptive powers and the train of associations it awoke in our brains. It was also highly necessary to learn to consider the abstract qualities of things apart from the things themselves. Rhythm, considered apart from its effect on the ear, left a mental image of form, and showed the connection which existed between music and architecture. This, and much more that was well calculated to make students reason, analyse, and discriminate clearly, occupied the lecturer, who also read a number of extracts from the chief writers on æsthetics, from Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle, to Hanslick and Herbert Spencer.

The competition for the Goldberg Prize (baritones and basses) took place on the 12th ult. The examiners were Messrs. Bantock Pierpoint, John Bridson, and W. H. Brereton (chairman). The prize was awarded to T. Meurig James. The competition for the Santley Prize took place on the 15th ult. The examiners were Miss Annie Glen, Signor F. Paolo Tosti, and Mr. Henry R. Bird (chairman). The prize was awarded to Edith O. Greenhill. The competition for the Evill Prize took place on the 17th ult. The examiners were Mesdames Bertha Huth (neé Moore), Marie Fillunger, and Mr. Iver McKay (chairman). The prize was awarded to Reginald Brophy. On the same day the competition for the Llewelyn Thomas Prize also took place. The examiners were Mesdames Bertha Huth (née Moore), Marie Fillunger, and Mr. Iver McKay (chairman). The prize was awarded to Louie Howell. The competition for the Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize took place on the 19th ult. The examiners were Mdlle. Ilona Eibenschütz, Mr. Frederick Dawson, and Mr. Harvey Löhr (chairman). The prize was awarded to Edith O. Greenhill. The competition for Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co.'s Prize for pianoforte playing (male students) took place on the 21st ult. The examiners were Messrs. Albert Fox and Arthur Somervell; and Madame Fanny Frickenhaus in the chair. The prize was awarded to Bernard Flanders. The competition for the Norman Salmond Prize (for Yorkshire students) took place on the 22nd ult. The candidates were examined by Madame Anna Williams, who awarded the prize to Sylvia Wardell. The competition for the Sterndale Bennett Prize also took place on the 22nd ult. The examiners were Miss Adelina de Lara, Mr. G. E. Bambridge, and Miss Dora Bright (in the chair). The prize was awarded to Sybil Palliser.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Mr. Hermann Klein may be congratulated upon the general excellence of the voices and the satisfactory results of careful training displayed by his pupils at their Vocal Recital on the 21st ult., in the practice-room of the Guildhall School. Several of the vocalists, in all twenty in number, can no longer be regarded as students, save in the sense that pertains to all young artists. Of these were Miss Jessie Hudleston, Miss Maud Ballade, Miss Annie Stonex, Miss Beatrice Frost, Miss Regina Atwater, and Mr. Leland Langley. The attention of these must now be chiefly devoted to the æsthetics of their art and to the gaining of the knowledge of "deeper depths," which only comes to the majority with the lapse of time. Foremost amongst the others who showed much promise were Miss Josephine Mann, Miss Violet Morrison, Miss Annie Northcroft, Miss Edith Leslie, and Mr. T. Stirling. Mr. Klein was ably assisted as accompanist by Miss Kate A. Davies.

IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

The second Concert of the recently-formed Imperial Orchestral Society took place on the 21st ult., when the audience greatly exceeded in number the seating accommodation which the temporary concert-room of the Imperial Institute affords. The most commendable performance of the evening was that of the first two movements of Bach's Concerto for two violins in D minor, the solo parts of which were admirably rendered by Miss Gertrude Collins and Mr. Louis d'Egville, the clever young student of the Royal Academy especially distinguishing herself by her intelligent phrasing and expressive style. Mr. C. Oberthür played with his wonted brilliancy in his Legend for the harp and orchestra, entitled "Loreley"; and the vocalists were Miss Ada Patterson and Mr. Ffrangcon Davies. The orchestra were most successful in the well known Entr'acte from Delibe's "Lakme" and a "Marche Indienne" by Sellenick; its performances of the "Meistersinger" Overture and the "Hungarian" March from Berlioz's "Faust" being rough and lacking in unanimity—faults which, under the conductorship of Mr. Randegger, time and future rehearsals will doubtless remove.

SIR JOHN STAINER ON "ST. PAUL."

The Oxford Professor delivered an elaborate Lecture on the subject of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," in the Sheldonian Theatre, which was crowded with listeners, on February 28. Having described the first conception of the work, and illustrated the difficulties in which the composer felt himself by a number of quotations from his letters, the lecturer pointed out that these passages almost warranted the drawing of a marked distinction between the two subjects of the Oratorio, the early part of which was really a church cantata on the death of St. Stephen, while the later part tended more in the direction of a concert oratorio. A great many of the numbers were carefully and appreciatively analysed, special attention being paid to the development of the chorales employed by Mendelssohn. A large number of these ancient tunes, in many of the various shapes that they had assumed at the hands of different musicians, were sung by the Professor of Music's choir, conducted by Dr. Mee. There can be no doubt that both the numbers and the intelligence of the audience who assembled to hear Mendelssohn's earlier Oratorio on the following day were largely due to the Professor's Lecture.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

There was "war in the air" at the meeting of the Musical Association on the 13th ult., when Mr. E. Prout took the chair to listen while Mr. Walter Wyatt read his paper upon "A suggested system of chromatic harmony." Mr. Wyatt bases his new system on the hypothesis of a harmonic chord relationship between a major key and its tonic minor and relative minor keys. After defining chromatic chords as "chords containing a note or notes foreign to the diatonic scale, which, while being in themselves highly characteristic of the keys, do not in their connection with the context appear to materially disturb the tonality," the lecturer explained his theory as follows:—"In the minor key there are four chromatic concords, all of which are major. They occur upon the minor second, tonic, supertonic, and raised submediant. By taking all the diatonic and chromatic concords in C major and transposing them into A minor, it will be seen that they embrace the whole of the diatonic and chromatic concords in C major. By selecting all the major concords in C major we obtain a major concord upon every note of what is usually termed the 'harmonic' chromatic scale. Secondly, by arranging these major concords in the order of roots progressing by fifths upwards, we obtain a complete cycle of diatonic and chromatic major concords possible in C major." The cycle so obtained forms the foundation upon which is built up the suggested system. This was further explained in an exhaustive manner that included reference to the 384th harmonic, upon which the lecturer said the first complete chromatic scale in the harmonic series began. No one contradicted this statement, or the subsequent reference to the 1,440th harmonic in support of the argument that sharps should be employed in the ascending chromatic scale; but Mr. Wyatt's earlier statements evoked animated opposition. Mr. Prout declared that a major triad on the raised submediant of the minor scale was utterly foreign to that scale, while hopelessly irreconcilable opinions were expressed by the lecturer and chairman as to what constituted a modulation. Round this point the battle raged "long and fiercely," with the usual result of confirming the respective opinions of the opponents. Finally, however, they "sheath'd their swords," not "for lack of argument," but for lack of time.

LONDON INSTITUTION.

Mr. Lionel Monckton's Lecture, entitled "Opera, its evolution and present tendencies," attracted a large audience to the theatre of the London Institution on February 22. The word "evolution" has a fashionable importance just now, which causes it to be used with such variable significance that its precise meaning to the majority of people has become somewhat vague. In this instance it stood for a comprehensive sketch of the history of opera from the time of Jacobo Peri to the death of Mozart, with some comments upon the tendencies of modern opera. Obviously to readers of The Musical Times the historical portion may be passed over with the remark that it instructively touched upon the most salient points. Consideration of recent operatic work inevitably introduced "the intermezzo opera." In Mr. Monckton's opinion "Cavalleria Rusticana" owes much of its success to its libretto, and brevity; and its composer has not yet given us his best work. The remarkable rejuvenescence of Verdi as seen in "Falstaff" was eulogistically commented upon, but the hope expressed that the abandonment of the overture or prelude would not be followed by other composers; a hope that will meet with the concurrence of most thoughtful minds, for the prelude, when properly constructed, undoubtedly enhances the effect of that which follows by placing the mind in an expectant and assimilative state. With regard to recent developments, the lecturer considered there were none more remarkable than those observable in what was commonly termed the modern Italian school. Germany seemed resting, and England had yet its position to gain. During the lecture an interesting series of illustrations from the operas referred to were admirably sung by Miss Edith Miller, Miss Florence Monteith, Mr. Scovell, and Mr. Charles Manners, who were accompanied by Mr. Capel at the pianoforte.

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE.

A large audience assembled on the 18th ult., at the South Place Institute, to hear Mr. E. F. Jacques lecture upon "Robert Schumann: Composer and Critic." Considerations of the composer and his life work were preceded by a brief but comprehensive resumé of the social state of Europe, which so greatly contributed to the development of what is commonly termed the romantic school, of which Schumann became a prominent leader. The lecturer showed that the meaning of instrumental music, as distinguished from its beauty—its appeal to the emotions and thoughts, as distinguished from its appeal to the senses and the appreciation of form—had been growing more and more definite all through the eighteenth century, as the works of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart indicated. With Beethoven this element became so prominent as to assume a dramatic aspect; and as instrumental forms, such as the sonata, arose in obedience solely to principles of design, it was obvious that when a certain point in the development of definite expression had been reached, form and contents would no longer perfectly suit each other. One must give way, and at the beginning of this century it was not likely that men would prefer beauty of form to significance. Men had realised that the old order was changing, and that the change was due to the re-assertion of eternal realities which had been almost forgotten during the preceding century. This striving for greater definiteness of expression was briefly traced in the works of Beethoven, Schubert, and Weber, and the surroundings which influenced Schumann's life and works lucidly explained, the peculiarities of his individuality being happily shown by several amusing anecdotes. The illustrations consisted of selections from Schumann's most characteristic pianoforte pieces, which were excellently played by Miss Llewela Davies, who, ably assisted by Mr. H. C. Wilson, also gave a most effective rendering of Nos. 3, 4, and 6 from the Pianoforte Duets "Bilder aus Osten" (Op. 66); and the songs "Widmung," "Er der Herrlichste," and "Ich grolle nicht," the two first being charmingly sung by Miss A. L. Burns, and the last-named expressively rendered by Mr. G. R. Betjemann.

THURSDAY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.

Messrs. William Nicholl, Septimus Webbe, Otto Peiniger, and Hans Adolf Brousil devoted the first portion of their programme at Princes' Hall, on the 1st ult., to works by Saint-Saëns. Contrary to custom, the popular tenor had no share in this section, but he made amends later by singing with true devotional feeling Schubert's "Ave Maria," Sullivan's "The Sailor's Grave," and "The Nameless Lassie," by Alex. Mackenzie, which was very much liked. His three companions in the direction of the Concerts, which have now extended through three seasons without deteriorating in artistic quality, joined in the French composer's interesting Trio in F for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 18), which was played in masterly fashion. The other instrumental piece from the same pen was the Sonata for pianoforte and violin in D (Op. 75), performed by Messrs. Septimus Webbe and Otto Peiniger with great spirit. These compositions were divided by the air from "Samson et Dalila," "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," sung with unexaggerated sentiment by Miss Elsie Mackenzie. The programme also included violoncello solos, well played by Mr. Brousil, Chopin's G minor Ballade, given with power and intelligence by Mr. Webbe, and Henschel's "Shouggie Shou, my Bairnie," which well suited Miss Mackenzie's voice.

MR. DOLMETSCH'S RECITALS.

The two Concerts given on February 27 and the 6th ult. concluded the series devoted to English composers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a series that, to many of Mr. Dolmetsch's patrons, must have been a surprising revelation of the remarkable musical abilities of our ancestors. That we should be indebted to the enthusiasm of a foreigner for our due appreciation of the talents of our own countrymen affords another proof of the existence of a peculiar and regrettable form of national modesty which frequently causes us to underrate and ignore that of which it is our duty to be proud. The compositions of John Jenkins and Christopher Simpson supplied the programme of the first-named Concert, and those of Matthew Lock and Henry Purcell the second. Both performances happily illustrated the advanced position held by England at the period in which these composers lived, but perhaps most interest was attached to the performances of Lock's chamber music, of which probably very little if any has been heard by even musicians of antiquarian tendencies, while to most he is chiefly known by that which Mr. W. H. Cummings assures us he did not write—viz., the incidental music to "Macbeth"; such is fame! The pieces played by Mr. Dolmetsch and his company consisted of a Prelude and Fugue for the organ, from "Melothesia," a book of musical instruction published by Lock in 1673; a characteristic Suite of five pieces for the harpsichord; a Suite for four viols, the third of a set of six; and a vocal duet, "I know my Redeemer lives." All these show considerable contrapuntal ingenuity of an imitative kind, but are characterised by a vagueness of tonality that to us deprives them of great musical interest. The extraordinary advance in expressive power made by Purcell was admirably shown by the pieces selected from this composer. These included the charming songs of the four seasons from the incidental music to the "Fairy Queen," which was a popular but mangled version of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the famous "Golden" Sonata; and the fine dramatic song "Let the dreadful engines."

BACH'S "PASSION MUSIC" AT ST. PAUL'S.

Bach's "Passion Music" (according to St. Matthew) was given in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 20th ult., in consonance with custom on the Tuesday in Holy Week. The affecting, devotional, and genuinely dramatic strains were listened to throughout with reverential attention by a congregation completely crowding the Cathedral. The noble choruses were sung by about 300 men and youths—the ordinary choir being, of course, largely augmented for the occasion—and there was a competent orchestra, numbering about fifty. The large and the moveable organs were respectively played by Messrs. William and Herbert Hodge, Mr. Frederick Walker was again at the pianoforte for the recitatives, and Dr. Martin conducted. In order that the treble and alto airs might reach the assemblage at the farther end of the building, they were sung by several choirboys together, and the chief solo parts were rendered with dignity by Messrs. Kenningham, Fryer, Miles, Kempton, and De Lacy. The congregation joined in the chorales to a much greater extent than before. Bach's sympathetic music was prefaced by Stainer's beautiful setting of the "Miserere mei, Deus."

THE MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

The Concerts of the Musical Artists' Society were resumed under the direction of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, the musical director, on the 20th ult., when the programme included Miss Llewela Davies's clever Sonata in E for violin and pianoforte, produced at the Royal Academy Students' Concert at St. James's Hall, on February 26 last; and the first performance of a Quartet, No. 2, in B flat (Op. 40), for two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Marie Wurm. The latter, as presented on this occasion, consisted of a fluently written Allegro; variations on an original theme, which would be improved by the omission of the last variation; a cleverly worked-out canon on a theme given by Dr. Joachim; and a brief and spirited Scherzo. The first of these works was admirably played by Miss Collins and the composer, but the latter, rendered by Messrs. Buziau, Kornfelt, Coutin, and Belinski, would have been more effective had it been more rehearsed. Three pianoforte Studies, written and played by Mr. Aguilar, and Mendelssohn's Quartet, No. 1, in E flat (Op. 12), were also included in the programme. The vocalists were Miss Henrica van Senden and Mr. Lewis Thomas, whose singing provided agreeable variety.

STRATFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The twelfth of the annual Competitions by residents throughout Essex, and in the E. and N.E. London districts, which concluded on the 15th ult. with a Concert by the prize winners at the Stratford Town Hall, is stated to have been the most successful yet held. There were in all thirty-four contests in different branches of music during the three days devoted to the purpose, and the increase in the average of efficiency testified to the influence the Festival has exercised in the localities from which the numerous competitors were drawn. The prizes and certificates were distributed at the Concert by Sir Joseph Barnby, who prefaced his task by a few practical observations. Having addressed some words of encouragement to the unsuccessful contestants, he said that music was the purest of the arts and one to which parents could put their children without fear. Music was being extensively cultivated at present, but he hoped education would widen and develop, and not be virtually restricted to the pianoforte. Sir Joseph urged the need for more orchestras, and trusted that when he next visited the Stratford Festival orchestral performances would be a feature. He noticed that the Committee had offered a prize for an oboe competition, and that there had not been a single entry. He was not surprised, for oboe players were few, and it was a sign of the necessity for other instruments besides the violin and pianoforte being studied.

MADAME PATEY.

Few events of recent occurrence in the musical world have caused a greater sensation than the death of the artist who, for long years, was our leading English contralto. Under ordinary circumstances Madame Patey's removal would have received particular attention and excited much regret, but she was called away so suddenly, and in a manner so profoundly dramatic and pathetic, that the occurrence can only be described as thrilling. Comparisons have been made between her death and that of Malibran, who also received a mortal stroke when on the public platform. The case of Madame Patey was, however, even more impressive than its forerunner. Malibran lived for two or three days after being struck down; Madame Patey expired in no more than five hours from receiving at the hands of a Sheffield audience the highest honours it was in their power to bestow. Verily, says the wise man, "all is vanity!" The death took place in the early morning hours of February 28.

The events of Janet Monach Patey's life were not such as call for an exciting record. Her early years were passed as hundreds of other girls with an inclination to music pass theirs, while the later time was one long, smooth current of success, unbroken by vicissitude and wholly lacking, save at the very close, in dramatic qualities. Her birth took place in London, May 1, 1842, and, it is said, in a house closely adjoining that wherein Charlotte Dolby first saw the light. An early tendency to music was encouraged by the child's parents, who not only placed her under the care of a teacher (Mr. J. Wass), but sanctioned her appearance as a very youthful soloist in Birmingham on some occasion the particulars of which are not before us. This, however, must be regarded as an isolated event. In course of time Miss Whytock—to use the name by which she first became publicly known—joined Henry Leslie's Choir as an amateur, and was occasionally chosen to take part in the incidental soli of the works performed by that body. These opportunities brought the future artist into notice, and led to a formal entry upon professional life, which may be said to have begun in earnest in 1865, when she was engaged by Mr. Lemmens for a provincial tour. The young contralto's progress in public favour, aided by a beautiful voice, together with a certain breadth and repose of manner characteristic also of Madame Sainton-Dolby, proved rapid, and from that time till her lamented death Madame Patey remained at the head of concert contraltos. During many years, no festival was held to be complete without her, and there were but "maimed rites" at Oratorio performances if she were not present. Composers of new works rejoiced in her assistance at their production; wherever she went, in point of fact, success followed. It was chained like a captive to her car of triumph. In 1866, Miss Whytock married Mr. J. G. Patey, himself an able artist and an intelligent adviser. In 1871 Madame Patey went to America as one of a concert troupe; four years later she fulfilled engagements in Paris, and, not long since, visited Australia, everywhere winning personal regard. During her absence at the Antipodes, younger singers came to the front in England; the result being that, on her return, with powers no longer what they once were, Madame Patey's appearances became comparatively few; the result being a determination to retire at the close of a farewell tour, which had nearly ended when Death claimed his victim. Madame Patey will long be remembered for the remarkable qualities of her true contralto voice, for her complete mastery of every work she took in hand before the public, and for a style which represented all that is best in the traditions of English concert singing. This is not the place in which to discuss her private virtues, remembrance of which heightens the grief of her friends. Madame Patey's remains were interred at Brompton Cemetery on the 7th ult., in presence of a great crowd of sympathisers.

OBITUARY.

We regret to announce the following deaths:—

On the 17th ult., the Rev. R. Brown-Borthwick, vicar of St. John's, Clapham, and formerly of All Saints', Scarborough, widely known as the editor of the "Supplemental Hymn and Tune Book," and one of the editors of "Church Hymns." Mr. Borthwick also wrote and composed a number of hymns and tunes, and translated H. Barbedette's "Life and works of Stephen Heller."

On the 8th ult., Mr. Gwyllym Crowe, who was for several years Conductor of the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, for which he composed several catchy waltzes. Amongst these one or two, notably the "See-Saw" Waltz, achieved almost phenomenal popularity. He did not display any particular gifts as a conductor of classical music, but he deserved well of musical amateurs by giving frequent performances of certain important works which were, till then, but little known.

At the moment of going to press we hear, with great regret, of the death of Sir Robert Stewart, Professor of Music at Dublin University, which took place on the 24th ult.

J. P. Maurin, professor of the violin at the Paris Conservatoire, and pupil of Baillot; one of the founders of the "Société des derniers quatuors de Beethoven," and member of several quartets. He died on the 16th ult., at Paris, aged seventy-one.

The Marquis Achille de Lauzières de Thémines, for over thirty years musical critic of the Paris paper La Patrie, in which he signed his feuilletons "De Thémines." He translated a great many libretti of French operas into Italian, and Italian libretti into French, besides which he wrote a number of original works of this class.

Signor Tosti has been appointed Professor of Singing at the Royal Academy of Music.

The eminent Flemish writer on music, M. Edmond Vander Straeten, has just brought out, in a limited edition, an interesting account of Charles V. as a musician. It is published at Ghent, by Jules Vuylsteke, and includes a composition attributed to that famous monarch.

We are glad to hear that, owing chiefly to the energetic advocacy of Miss Wakefield, the Westmoreland County Council have at last consented to include music as a subject for which grants will be paid under the Technical Education Act. This is a victory for perseverance, and should encourage others throughout the country to importunities on behalf of music.

The final examination for fourteen Open Free Scholarships has recently taken place at the Royal College of Music. The total number of candidates applying throughout the United Kingdom was 419. Of these fifteen were absent from illness, twenty-nine were disqualified on various grounds, and the remainder were examined by the honorary local examiners, at ninety-four centres, on January 31, and reduced to 145. Owing to various causes, eight of these subsequently withdrew, and the remaining 137 were brought up for final examination at the College itself. The following are the names of the successful candidates:—Pianoforte: Beatrice Cerasoli, South Kensington; Ernest P. Swan, London. Singing: Louisa Kirkby Lunn, Manchester; Agnes H. Nicholls, Cheltenham; Leon Zagury, Liverpool. Organ: Tom Haigh, Wakefield. Violin: William J. Read, Walsall; C. Barré Squire, Swansea. Violoncello: Robert P. Jones, Barmouth. Wind Instruments—Oboe: Albert C. Horton, Plumstead. Bassoon: Edwin J. Cox, Swindon. Trumpet; Robert C. S. de Courcy, Hammersmith. Composition: Percy Harmon, Kentish Town; William M. Y. Hurlstone, Norwood. The examiners report that the competition this year has been unusually severe, and the standard of performance has risen considerably since former examinations.

REVIEWS.

Clavierstücke. Von Johannes Brahms. Op. 118 and Op. 119. [Berlin: N. Simrock.]

The pianoforte may not be the king of instruments, and yet all the great composers have been fond of it; all have revealed through it some of their brightest joys and deepest sorrows. Brahms, like Schumann, commenced by writing much for this instrument, only, unlike his predecessor, he worked on larger lines, and produced three important Sonatas, Op. 1, 2, and 5. To that form he has never returned in his solo pianoforte compositions; there followed Ballades, Variations, Waltzes; then, after a considerable interval, came two Rhapsodies, and, last year, two books of short pieces similar to the present ones. Of those now under review, Op. 118 contains six numbers. No. 1 is an Intermezzo, sombre in colour, passionate in character; strangely does the long appoggiatura note on the accented beat disguise the tonality of the opening phrase. At the close, the inversion of the chord of the minor thirteenth, rendered still more mournful by the restless bass, followed by the major tonic chord, offers a happy contrast. No. 2, also an Intermezzo, opens with a graceful, delicate theme, somewhat à la Mendelssohn. The middle minor section, with its canonic imitations and dreamy disposition, offers attractions of a different kind. No. 3, Ballade, is full of energy, at least in the principal section; and the harmonies of the accompaniment are interesting. An enharmonic modulation leads to a quiet, soothing middle episode. The contrast of keys in the two sections is striking: the first is in G minor, the second in B major. No. 4 is again an Intermezzo. Imitation is prevalent throughout, and is especially prominent in the middle major portion. But while skilful in treatment, the piece is not lacking in feeling. No. 5, a Romanze in F, is a real gem. A soft, gently flowing theme of eight bars is twice repeated, with varying accompaniment, and then follows an Allegretto grazioso in the major key of the submediant; after which, with slight variation, and in still briefer form, the principal theme is heard once again. The Allegretto, though more modern in character, is akin to the "Musette" Gavotte in Bach's D minor Suite. The two sections of this Romance differ in outward appearance, yet are intimately connected. No. 6, Intermezzo, in the mournful key of E flat minor, is a weird, sad piece; and the sombreness is relieved only for one moment, when the theme in the relative major key enters; loud minor chords are soon heard, followed by a passionate delivery of the principal theme. The composer must indeed have been in sorrowful mood when he penned this piece. Op. 119 opens with an Intermezzo, an Adagio movement of quiet, though somewhat formal character. Nos. 2 and 3 each bear a similar title. They both contain many interesting points in harmony and rhythm, yet there are traces in them of the midnight oil. No. 4, a Rhapsodie, is bold and Hungarian-like in character; it is by no means comfortable to play. Taken as a whole these new compositions are of higher interest than the set which appeared last year.

Octavo Anthems. Nos. 436—441.

Harvest Festivals are as yet far distant, but organists and choirmasters will do well to bear in mind new compositions suitable for these joyous occasions. Of this nature are "Man goeth forth to his work," by Arthur Carnall, and "I will greatly rejoice," by W. A. C. Cruickshank. The first is a full anthem written in a solemn and dignified style, and quite within the means of Parish Church Choirs, though containing phrases which display the influence of modern music. The next is rather more elaborate. A bright and vigorous chorus in D leads to a quieter and very tuneful tenor solo and chorus, a réprise of the opening section, slightly varied, bringing the anthem to an effective conclusion. No. 438, "Let not your heart be troubled," by Myles B. Foster, is described as an easy full anthem—and so it is, although the composer indulges in unprepared discords very freely. These have an effect of unrest, which is, perhaps, designed, for the close on the words "I will give you rest" is reposeful and charming. No. 439, "Praise the Lord, O my soul," by T. P. Royle, for treble solo and chorus, is a cheerful, unpretentious little anthem, without any special characteristics to which it is desirable to call attention. Rather more ambitious in structure is "Before the heavens were spread abroad," by Horatio W. Parker. It opens solemnly with a chorus Grave, leading to a quicker and more extended movement, "The morning stars sang together." Some striking key transitions in the accompaniment are followed by a brief tenor solo, which is repeated, with variations, in chorus, the anthem coming to a pompous and even brilliant climax. The last for the present is "Thy mercy, O Lord," by George Garrett. This is described as a Festival anthem for tenor solo and chorus. It opens in grandiose fashion, and the first choral movement is considerably extended, though elaborate contrapuntal writing is avoided. Another somewhat lengthy section for tenor solo and chorus, chiefly in alternation, is followed, after a full close, by a dignified double chorus, hymn-like in character, bringing the composition to a thoroughly church-like conclusion.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Second series. Nos. 685—697. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We commence our notice of the latest numbers of this popular publication with mention of an attractive and rather quaint and florid, but quite easy four-part song, "When Flora decks," words by J. Cunningham and music by Noel Johnson. No. 686, "I think on thee in the night," by Elizabeth Fédarb, is pleasing, but more quiet, placid, and sentimental. No. 687, "The evening wind," by F. G. Harper, is a setting of verses by "Christabel"; the music is strophic and very tender, with sensuous harmonic progressions rather suggestive of Spohr. A brief setting of Herrick's lines, "To daisies not to shut so soon," by J. D. Davis, No. 686, has nothing in common with antiquarian music, for it is distinctly modern in style. The final cadence is fresh and effective. No. 689, "Beauty, arise," by Kellow J. Pye, is an Ode to Hymen, the words being by Thomas Dekker, 1599. The music is unpretentious and reposeful; indeed, if adapted to sacred words, it would make a pleasing little anthem. Shakespeare's familiar lines, "It was a lover," receive another musical illustration in No. 690, by Charles Wood. The setting is singularly dainty and piquant, and if sung with crispness and refinement should be much appreciated by lovers of unaccompanied part-music. Florid music for voices is rather out of fashion at present, but "Sweet Thrush," by J. Danby, No. 691, might well be taken in hand by choirs, or, preferably, a quartet of single voices. It is very pretty, but it needs highly finished singing. The last six on our list for the present are Spohr's Op. 120, with excellent English words translated from the German by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. Although these delightful little pieces are scarcely known as yet in this country, the name of their composer is a guarantee of their excellence, and we may add that, if practicable, they should be sung without accompaniment.

Masters of French Music. By Arthur Hervey. [Osgood, McIlvaine and Co.]

Mr. Hervey's book may be warmly recommended not only to all admirers of French music, but to every lover of the art. The author is in thorough sympathy with his subject, while, at the same time, his long experience as an English critic prevents him, while recognising the merits and beauties of French music, from being blind to its weaknesses and defects. The composers whose lives and works are most fully treated of are Ambroise Thomas, Charles Gounod, Saint-Saëns, Jules Massenet, Ernest Reyer, and Alfred Bruneau; brief but comprehensive comments being also made upon Victorin Joncières, Théodore Dubois, Charles Marie Widor, Benjamin Godard, Emile Paladilhe, Gervais Bernard Salvayre, César Franck, Vincent d'Indy, Gabriel Fauré, Emmanuel Chabrier, and others. The value and interest of the criticisms are much increased by the quotation of contemporary French critical opinions, and amusing anecdotes which convey, better perhaps than could otherwise be done, the peculiarities of temperament of the various composers. Deductions from present tendencies can scarcely be made without reference to the past, and thus many a seasonable word is said concerning past composers whose works have exercised an important influence on the music of modern France. Prominent amongst those thus referred to is Meyerbeer, concerning whom it is justly said: "It has been too much the fashion in recent years to decry the works of Meyerbeer, and to lay stress upon their shortcomings whilst giving but a grudging half-hearted acknowledgment of the many undeniable beauties that pervade them. Against so unjust a verdict I desire emphatically to protest, for however much Meyerbeer may have sacrificed for the sake of effect, there can be no doubt that he contributed in a large measure towards raising the operatic standard, then at a very low level. If we find the rich crop of wheat not devoid of chaff, we must at any rate admit that the former is of excellent quality. To be the author of 'Les Huguenots,' the fourth act of 'Le Prophète,' and the music to 'Struensee,' not to speak of many another dramatic masterpiece, is in itself a sufficient title to rank amongst the greatest musicians of the age." One of the most interesting portions of the book is that devoted to Saint-Saëns, who, in his works, is aptly described as "Janus-like, keeping one side of his head turned towards Bach, Handel, and Beethoven, whilst he finds means with the other to gaze at Liszt, Wagner, and Gounod." Most readers of this instructive volume will probably quickly turn to the chapter headed "Alfred Bruneau," and they can scarcely do so without profit to themselves. Preceding his remarks by saying, "It has always appeared to me to be idle to attempt to impose one's ideas upon the relative merits of a composition on those whose disposition is antagonistic to its due appreciation," the author argues in favour of Bruneau's procedures with a calmness and completeness that will gladden the hearts of this composer's admirers. The book also contains portraits and fac-simile specimens of the scores of the leading French composers commented upon, and a most useful list of their principal works, together with the dates of their production.

Three Songs. By Johann Sebastian Bach. Edited, with a pianoforte accompaniment, by C. A. Barry. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Interest in these songs is at once awakened by the following note by the Editor which appears on the first page: "Anna Magdalena Bach, the second wife of Johann Sebastian Bach, possessed two 'music-books,' into which it was her wont to copy out such pieces, both vocal and instrumental, as took her fancy, and to which her husband occasionally contributed. The three songs, now for the first time made available for general use, are to be found in their original shape in Vol. 39 of the Leipzig Bachgesellschaft's edition of Bach's works." Mr. Barry's editing necessitated the provision of suitable accompaniments—for Bach had only written the vocal melody in the now obsolete soprano clef, together with a slightly figured bass—and the suggestions of tempi and marks of expression that seemed in accordance with the master's intentions. These important particulars have been admirably supplied, and the collection should be acquired by every lover of Bach, not merely because of its antiquarian interest, but for its musical value. The character of the three songs may be gathered from their titles—viz., "Gedenke doch, mein Geist, zurücke" (Consider well, my soul), "Bist du bei mir" (Stay thou with me), and "Erbauliche gedanken eines Tabaksrauchers" (Edifying thoughts of a smoker), the English translations of which have been admirably supplied by C. F. Herman. The first two are suitable to a soprano voice, and the last may be recommended to the attention of baritone vocalists.

Tabulatura Nova. By Samuel Scheidt. Für Orgel und Clavier. Herausgegeben von Max Seiffert. [Breitkopf and Härtel.]

Not the least of the many advantages which the art or music derives from large publishing firms is the republication of works which change of taste and various developments have caused to be neglected. In the majority of instances republication not only means rescue from undeserved oblivion, but the preservation of valuable indications of the prevalent modes of thought and practices of our forefathers.

The fine edition of Scheidt's "Tabulatura Nova" now under review is a remarkable example of these facts. The work was originally published as a whole in Hamburg in 1624, when it marked the beginning of a new era in the treatment of the organ—i.e., the banishment of the clumsy and insufficient so-called German tablature and the introduction of what may be termed the virtuoso element into organ playing combined with contrapuntal development. The work is in three parts, the last of which by its style and treatment of the pedal part will appeal most strongly to organists. The first two parts, indeed, are more in sympathy with the harpsichord than the organ. The virtuoso element predominates and many of the pieces are too secular in character for present church use. The third part, however, is entirely intended for employment in the sanctuary, and, amongst much that is indicative of the spirit which animated worship in the seventeenth century, includes examples of the music played according to the usages of the time between verses of the Magnificat and other portions of the service, which were sung or intoned unaccompanied by the choir or officiating priest. This part also contains Luther's version of the Creed with its melody in the Dorian mode, several hymns arranged to be played instead of sung, many of which would make impressive voluntaries. To the organist who takes an interest in the history of his instrument this music will appeal with especial significance when it is remembered that it was published more than sixty years before Johann Sebastian Bach was born.

Robert Schumann's Werke. Herausgegeben von Clara Schumann. Serie XIV. Supplement.

[Breitkopf and Härtel.]

This is an Appendix to Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel's complete edition of Schumann's works. It includes several compositions which are now published for the first time—e.g., the Andante and Variations for two pianofortes (Op. 46) in their original form—viz., as a Quintet for two pianofortes, two violoncellos, and horn in E flat—a unique combination! According to tradition, the arrangement for two pianofortes only was made at the request of the publisher to whom this Quintet was offered in the first instance. There are also the five Studies which were at first intended for the "Etudes Symphoniques" (Op. 13), but afterwards omitted from both of the editions published during Schumann's lifetime. Other novelties are a Scherzo, written as the second movement of the third Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 14), and a Presto Passionato originally meant for the Finale of the second Sonata (Op. 22). Further, the volume contains three songs and a duet, and the final piece is Schumann's last musical thought—viz., a Thema composed on February 7, 1854, three weeks before his attempted suicide. Five variations which the unfortunate composer wrote on this theme are not to be given to the world. No less an artist than Johannes Brahms is the editor of this interesting volume. In the short preface which he has written for it he makes touching reference to the said Thema and its author: "It seems to speak to us as if it were the kind greeting of a departing spirit, and we think with veneration and emotion of the glorious man and artist." How it appealed to Brahms we know from the beautiful variations for Pianoforte Duet (Op. 23) which he wrote upon it, and dedicated to Schumann's daughter, Julie.

Organ Arrangements. Edited by George C. Martin. Nos. 17 and 18. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these transcriptions consists of Corelli's Concerto Grosso in C (No. 10), a work that lends itself very well to organ treatment, the vigorous character of the music being unalloyed by frivolous ornamentation. Each of the movements is suitable as a church voluntary. The arranger is Mr. A. B. Plant, while Mr. James Shaw is responsible for No. 18, a Passecaille in B minor, by Couperin. This is an extremely piquant and generally effective piece of moderate difficulty, and ought to please a wide circle alike of performers and listeners. Dr. Martin may be urged to continue his labours in unearthing buried treasures of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries.

Songs from Shakespeare. Edited by Professor Bridge. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This interesting collection consists of the earliest known settings of some of Shakespeare's most beautiful lyrics, which served as musical illustrations to the editor's recent lectures on the music of Shakespeare at Gresham College. The handy little volume contains two settings each of "O, mistress mine," "O willo, willo," "Full fathom five," and "Where the bee sucks," and single settings of "It was a lover and his lass," "Take, O take," and "Come unto these yellow sands," the composers being Thomas Morley, W. Byrd, J. Wilson, R. Johnson, J. Banister, and P. Humfrey. A brief preface supplies antiquarian information concerning the various songs, most of which possess a musical value and charm that should ensure their speedy addition to the repertory of every cultured vocalist as well as to the library of all Shakespearian devotees.

Awake, put on thy strength. Anthem. By F. R. Greenish, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This anthem was composed for the annual Festival of the Haverfordwest District Musical Association last year, and is selected to be sung with orchestral accompaniment at the annual Choral Festival at Longwood Parish Church, Huddersfield, during the present year. It therefore comes to us with good credentials, which it may be said at once are well deserved. The opening chorus is bright and straightforward, and is followed by a chorale, the words, "O that birth for ever blessed," being reprinted by permission from "Hymns Ancient and Modern." A brief tenor solo and chorus in a somewhat quiet vein lead to the final chorus, which, commencing fugally, works into another hymn, "O ye heights of Heaven, adore Him," with which the anthem concludes in imposing fashion.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A Concert of unusual excellence was given by the Philharmonic Society in the Ulster Hall on the 1st ult., when the Society closed its season with a very fine performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul." The local orchestra was considerably strengthened with players from Sir Charles Hallé's and other bands across the Channel, and the chorus represented the full vocal strength of the Society. The soloists engaged were Miss Medora Henson (soprano), Mr. J. Leyland (tenor), and Mr. Andrew Black (bass), the alto being taken by a member of the Society. All the beautiful effects of this delightful composition were brought out, under the direction of Mr. F. Koeller, the Society's talented Conductor, to whom the credit is due of having given the finest performance of this work yet heard in the city. Mr. Andrew Black created a great impression by his artistic singing, and Miss Henson and Mr. Leyland were fully equal to their respective parts.

On the 7th ult. an exceedingly interesting Concert was given in the Ulster Hall in aid of the "Institute of Journalists' Orphan Fund." The building was crowded to excess, and the financial results must be equal to the most sanguine anticipations of the promoters. The Concert, which was entirely miscellaneous, was contributed to by Mdlle. Noemi Lorenzi, who made a most favourable impression; Miss Elsner, whose singing also gave much pleasure; Mr. Edwin Rennie, who always pleases a Belfast audience; Mr. W. Franklin, from Mr. Valentine Smith's Opera Company, who is a great and deserved favourite here; Mr. W. Hillier, tenor; and Miss L. J. A. McLean, contralto. Among the instrumentalists were Herr Theodore Werner, solo violinist; Mr. Lawrence Walker, solo pianoforte, and the band of the Yorkshire Regiment. Herr Louis Werner and Mr. Thomas Picton acted as accompanists.

The Belfast Orchestral Society gave its third and last Concert on the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Thomas H. Crowe; and Mr. G. C. Ferguson gave his annual Concert of Irish music, on the 16th ult., in the Ulster Hall, assisted by Miss Elsie Connolly, Madame Julia Ryan, Mr. Edwin Rennie, and Mr. F. Smith.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times, December 11, 1893.

LOTT'S
CLASSICAL
PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

Bound in Cloth, Four Shillings net.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor overcomes the difficult task of 'teaching the young idea how to shoot' over musical preserves. It is a decidedly practical work, has no superfluous padding, and is so simple in its explanations that the veriest tyro might teach himself to master scales major and minor, and encourage himself en route by mild diversion with Haydn, Handel, Meyerbeer, Mozart, and others. The composer of these exercises has wisely seen that on the 'nubbly' high-road of musical education a few milestones are necessary to cheer the fainting heart, and amidst the dough of prosaic explanation he has inserted here and there a plum from the old masters—a plum of just sufficient size to whet the appetite without the risk of indigestion."—The Gentlewoman.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor will be found eminently suitable for teaching purposes, and we can confidently recommend it as a guide to all beginners. The examples have been selected with care, and are of a character likely to please the young pupil, besides moulding his or her taste to the elements of classical form. A glossary of general musical terms is to be found at the end of the volume. The printing throughout is clear, and the musical type well displayed."—The New Quarterly Musical Review.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor is a book of instruction which has some special qualities of its own. The author, a refined and thoughtful musician, in this work takes the student into paths apart from the flashy 'airs with variations' school, and the extracts given are from composers little known in the commonplace routine of ordinary teaching. To those who desire to interpret the higher forms of pianoforte composition, Lott's Tutor will be a sound and practical guide."—The Era.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor has some distinguishing features from its fellow tutors. After, with commendable brevity and clearness, teaching the elementary portion, the composer starts at once with extracts from classical masters of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. For example, Martin Luther's Chorale 'Eine Feste Burg' (1483-1546), 'God save the Queen' (John Bull, 1563-1628), 'Dead March' in 'Saul' (G. F. Handel, 1685-1759), Chorus from 'Les Huguenots' (J. Meyerbeer, 1791-1864), 'God preserve the Emperor' (J. Haydn), 'Rondo' (Anton Diabelli, 1761-1858), examples from Beethoven, Corelli, Mendelssohn, 'The Old Hundredth Psalm' (Claude Goudimel, 1516-1572), and other less well-known old composers."—Daily News.

"Lott's Classical Pianoforte Tutor deserves more than passing mention. Instead of containing a heterogeneous collection of popular melodies, interspersed with airs from Italian and other operas, as is usual in works of this class, we have a careful compilation of extracts from the works of the great masters, judiciously arranged according to their respective degrees of difficulty, thus justifying its title. We have, on the whole, nothing but praise for the work, it being a decided improvement on any manual of initiatory instruction we have seen."—The Morning.

NEW YORK. LONDON. TORONTO.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the past month several musical events of exceptional interest have taken place. Unfortunately, we were debarred, for reasons well known, from the promised enjoyment of Dr. Parry's "Hypatia" music—which the composer was to have conducted in person—at Mr. Stockley's Concert of February 22. At this Concert Mr. Leonard Borwick made his appearance for the first time here. His performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat ("The Emperor") was a truly masterly and perfect one; in his playing modern development of style seems happily combined with the true classic spirit. Mr. Borwick also gave some short pieces by Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Liszt, at the close receiving a veritable ovation from his delighted audience. The band (considerably enlarged on this occasion) performed, for its chief numbers: Beethoven's C minor Symphony, a set of Chromatic Waltzes by Cyril Kistler, and Wagner's "Walkürenritt." The rendering of the Symphony was irreproachable—never, indeed, have we heard Mr. Stockley's orchestra play better than on this occasion. It speaks much for the musical resources of this city that eight horn players, not to speak of strengthened flute, oboe, bassoon, and trombone parts, can be had at call for Wagnerian requirements, without any need of outside assistance. We can but regret, however, the threatened extinction altogether of the trumpet; in a little time, we fear, the trumpet will, for concert purposes, be as obsolete as, say, the serpent or the basset horn. It is a great pity: can nothing be done? Miss Hilda Wilson was the vocalist on this occasion.

Messrs. Harrison, according to their custom, engaged Sir Charles Hallé's band for the final Concert of their season, on the 5th ult. The orchestral works performed were: Dvorák's Symphony (No. 4) in G, Beethoven's Festival Overture, Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, and Massenet's "Fête Bohême." The Town Hall was filled from top to bottom, and the audience was an exceedingly enthusiastic one. Certain amateurs have since been ventilating their emotions in the columns of the local papers. They would have such an orchestra established here as a permanent institution—if Manchester can afford to sustain such, why not Birmingham? &c. It is to be regretted, however, that some of these writers in their zeal overlook Mr. Stockley's admirable efforts altogether. It is not players that are wanting here, but patronage of a sustained and proper sort. Lady Hallé played in Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto (violin) and produced some Irish pieces by Professor Stanford; while Sir Charles himself appeared as pianist in Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp minor and Liszt's "Waldesrauschen." Madame Alice Gomez and Mr. Edward Lloyd, as vocalists, put the finishing touches to a brilliant programme.

Miss Adelina de Lara gave a Recital at the Masonic Hall on the 1st ult. Two Romances of Schumann (Op. 28), the Ballade in G minor of Chopin, and some miscellaneous pieces by Tschaikowsky, Mendelssohn, Paderewski, and Rubinstein were Miss de Lara's solos. She also took part with Mr. Edward Howell (violoncello) in Mendelssohn's Variations in D minor (Op. 17) and in Brahms's Sonata in E minor (Op. 38). Miss de Lara was well supported by her Birmingham friends.

The Birmingham String Quartet gave the fourth Concert of its series on February 27. Mr. W. H. Henley, as on previous occasions, was leader of the party; the solo pianist was Mrs. Richardson; the vocalist, Miss Edith Ryland. Some novelties were introduced, notably a very tuneful if not profound Quartet (in G, Op. 79) for strings, by Antonio Bazzini; and a Sonata for violoncello (in F) by Marcello—very cleverly rendered by Mr. A. J. Priestley. Miss Ryland pleased greatly in some melodious little songs of Hans Sitt and Rubinstein. Very good attendances at these Concerts seem to augur well for the future of this young and very enterprising Society.

Mr. Turner completed his opera season—a phenomenal record of eleven weeks—on the 10th ult., at the Grand Theatre, with a performance of "La Sonnambula," followed by Dibdin's "Waterman." Mr. Turner, as the genial and ever-welcome Tom Tug in the latter piece, more than satisfied his many admirers. There was a remarkably full house. We must not forget to report a commendable production of "Fidelio" by Mr. Turner's company since last writing.

An Amateur Operatic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. F. W. Beard, after long and careful preparation, gave four performances of "Faust" at the Theatre Royal, on the 7-10th ult. Different performers appeared on alternate nights, the Marguerites being Miss Nellie Gosnell and Miss Nellie Brown. The performances altogether were very creditable; certainly no expense was spared in the matter of dress and general "getting-up," while artists and audiences appeared equally enthusiastic.

The Amateur Orchestral Society presided over by Mr. Halford has given a performance of the "Elijah." Mr. Halliley, at his popular Saturday Concerts, has again drawn good audiences; Signor Alsepti, the clever (blind) performer upon the concertina, and Mr. Hopkins, with his "silver bells," once more coming at his judicious call. We must not overlook, in conclusion, the production (upon the 10th ult.) of a new cantata, "The Crusader," by Mr. Thomas Facer, whose work, though of the facile sort, is remarkably melodious and attractive. Mr. Facer is a Tonic Sol-fa teacher under our School Board, and is well experienced in the writing of choral works intended for the exercise and pleasure of the "growing" public.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual Concert of the Society of Bristol Gleemen, which took place on the 7th ult., was the chief musical event of the month. The novelties, so far as the Society is concerned, were Abt's "Come, fisher-boat, come," Stehle's "Polish Patriotic Song," and Otto's "Come, O gentle night," which, although more or less difficult, were praiseworthily interpreted and met with marked favour. The soloists of the evening were Mr. C. Gregory, Mr. J. W. Davey, and Mr. W. H. Wickes, who sang with discrimination and taste, and whose efforts were rewarded by hearty approval. Mr. W. J. Kidner, the Conductor, and the Society are to be congratulated on the success of the Concert.

At Redcliffe Church, on February 27, a new Passion Cantata, "The Man of Sorrows," from the pen of Dr. C. W. Pearce, was sung, under the direction of the author. The work follows the lines of the "Crucifixion," the story being set forth by solos and choruses, hymns being introduced for congregational use. Master Hicken and Mr. J. H. Ward were the soloists, and Mr. J. W. Lawson presided at the organ. On the evening of the 13th ult. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was repeated at Redcliffe Church, where it has been frequently done.

Mr. George Riseley, in distributing, on February 20, the prizes and certificates won by the students of the Kingswood College of Music, referred with gratification to the establishment of an Orchestral Class in connection with the College, and expressed the hope that the study of bowed and wind instruments might spread and that permanent local orchestras might be a thing of the near future.

Master Cyril Tyler, the boy soprano, was the chief attraction at the ballad and instrumental Concert given at the Victoria Rooms, on the 1st ult.

The last of the series of Concerts organised by Messrs. Harrison took place at Colston Hall on the 19th ult., and was an artistic success.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The mixture of extreme piety and of narrow-mindedness which so characterises us sometimes leads to situations savouring somewhat of impiety. Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli" is surely the most profoundly ideal of sacred music. It was composed a century and a half before Protestantism had been dreamed of, for the services of a church which was Catholic in the widest sense. It was on this occasion undertaken for the first time in Scotland by the most lavishly endowed choir in Edinburgh, in tercentenary memory of the great composer, and yet St. George's Choir was banished from the noble dome, and it was even forbidden to hold its practices in sacred precincts so long as its attention was taken up with a work branded by the "Mass" (a word abhorred of all the descendants of the mythical Jenny Geddes) and associated with the name of an actual Pope. And so the congregation saved their temple from pollution and went to the Music Hall to see the choir in evening dress, and amid the blaze of gas and the secular atmosphere of an ordinary concert-room vigorously to applaud such music as Pius said St. John must have heard in his vision, and such profoundly moving thoughts as the "Et Incarnatus" or the "Agnus Dei."

While fulfilling only a manifest duty in this protest we must not forget to express our thanks and praise to Mr. Hartley, who was at such pains to compass a worthy rendering of the monumental work. In spite of the unsuitable environment the work made a very deep impression on a large audience. Other numbers were Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," Gounod's "Come unto Him," and Sterndale Bennett's "O that I knew," in all of which the unaccompanied choir showed equal care and attained similar success.

Ere this is published Mr. Henschel's first campaign will have come to an end. It has been in every sense a triumph, and it is pleasant to hear that the amalgamation of the rival schemes will next season remove all opposition. Mr. Henschel has enjoyed advantages which no predecessor in Scotland ever enjoyed, a long season and unlimited rehearsal being the chief of these; and in consequence the Scottish Orchestra has reached a point of perfection, in breadth of style, unanimity of sentiment, and fineness of nuance, to which all have borne testimony.

At the ninth Concert, on the 12th ult., Mozart's immortal G minor Symphony received an almost ideal interpretation and Miss E. M. Smyth's "Anthony and Cleopatra" Overture received a fully worthy interpretation. Mr. Francis Gibson, a local pianist, was recalled for his rendering of a not too interesting Concerto by Hiller, and Mrs. Henschel added to her great popularity by her extremely artistic singing of Liszt's "Lorelei" and songs by Schubert and Kahn.

The Edinburgh Choral Union showed the results of Mr. Collinson's careful training in "Samson," on the 5th ult. A large audience gathered in the Music Hall to hear the ever interesting work. With the exception of a little want of proportion in the alto part, the chorus was in excellent form and sang with great spirit and abundant effect. Madame Dews was loudly cheered for her expressive rendering of the contralto music. The other soloists were only moderately successful, and a very unequal orchestra, professional and amateur, did but scanty justice to the accompaniments.

The time-honoured annual Chamber Concert of the Philosophical Institution attracted a good audience to hear Dr. Joachim, Signor Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies in a delightful programme. Miss Louise Phillips was the vocalist and at once established herself in the good graces of the audience.

The Literary Institute Hall was very well filled when Mr. Moonie's Male Voice Choir gave its annual Concert. Mr. Moonie has produced "The Desert" on more than one previous occasion, so that the choir is thoroughly familiar with the delightful cantata and the performance was proportionately successful. Markull's effective cantata "Roland's Horn" was the other choral work, and was also very well sung. A small but efficient orchestra, under Mr. Dambmann, accompanied.

The Stirling Choral Society gave a successful performance of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" on the 6th ult., and much credit is due to Dr. Allum, the Conductor, and the Executive of the Society, for placing this fine work before their audience in so worthy a manner. The orchestra and chorus numbered 150, their work calling for high commendation. The soloists were Mrs. Haden, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. E. Branscombe, and Mr. Andrew Black. Mr. Scott Hunter presided at the organ.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At the closing Concert of the Glasgow Choral Union, on the 1st ult., Dr. Joachim, Mr. Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies once more charmed their countless admirers hereabouts, and with a programme which contained many good things—albeit a stronger bill of fare might easily enough have been provided. Everybody, however, listens with delight to Dr. Joachim's incomparable playing of Bach's "Chaconne," has full sympathy with Mr. Piatti's reverent care of "Kol Nidrei," and, as regards the Schumann and Beethoven Trios, only one opinion found currency amongst the audience—that of perfect satisfaction with the ensemble. The vocalist was Miss Louise Phillips, a new-comer, who soon made many friends by reason of her excellent voice and cultured style.

The Scottish Orchestra Company has had the field to itself during the past month, but the musical public were, we dare say, more concerned with the rumours current from time to time regarding an amalgamation of the Glasgow Choral Union and the organisation just named. Everybody was in "touch" with a coalition which would be honourable to both parties, the negotiations were of an exceedingly harmonious nature, and at length a solution of several difficult enough problems was happily discovered. It is not needful to enter into details, except to say that Mr. August Manns will have charge of the orchestra for a limited period during next season, the larger portion of the work falling, however, to Mr. Henschel, who proposes to occasionally take his men to London in connection with his Symphony Concerts. It was also decided to have a joint Concert on the 29th ult., and for which Beethoven's Choral Symphony was placed in rehearsal. The Concerts given by the Company last month were hardly of uniform excellence, and the programme maker was not, truth to tell, always at his best. Nevertheless some admirable work was accomplished by Mr. Henschel and his band, and amongst the novelties we had Miss E. M. Smyth's highly-promising Overture to "Antony and Cleopatra." Miss Ilona Eibenschütz came North to play in Beethoven's E flat Concerto (No. 5), but the work is somewhat beyond the powers of this rising young pianist. A Wagner programme, arranged in chronological order, drew a large audience to the Popular Concert on the 10th ult. Five movements from Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony were given on the 17th ult., and at the twelfth Classical Orchestral Concert Lady Hallé was heard in Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's beautiful "Highland Ballad" for violin and orchestra, the programme otherwise containing Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and Mr. MacCunn's Overture "Land of the Mountain and the Flood." At the fifth Chamber Concert of the series, Brahms's B flat major Quartet (Op. 67) had a very fine interpretation at the hands of Mr. Sons and his trusted coadjutors, and the leader of the party excelled in his solo from Bach's Sonata in E.

Much interest centred in the seven performances of Gounod's "Mirella," which were brought to a close on the evening of the 3rd ult. The opera was produced under the auspices of the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music. There were no fewer than three casts, the fine band and chorus numbered seventy performers, and the stage management and scenic adjuncts were singularly good. On each occasion the audiences drawn to the beautiful concert-room in Buchanan Street were large, and so great was the success of the "Pastoral" that it will in all probability be revived next autumn. The Principal of the School, Mr. Allan Macbeth, conducted, and again showed the excellence of the material under his direction. A few nights later on, opera was also to the fore at the Athenæum, where the Orpheus Club, conducted by Mr. James Barr, gave three highly meritorious performances of the "Pirates of Penzance" to crowded houses. Good work has, moreover, been accomplished during the past month by some of our smaller choral societies, and in this respect it is pleasing to record the continued popularity of Mr. A. R. Gaul's cantatas. On the 1st ult., for example, the Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church Choir gave, successfully, the Birmingham composer's "Israel in the Wilderness"; the fluent choral writing in "Una" was in the safe charge of the Greenhead United Presbyterian Church Choir on the evening of the 7th ult.; and another of Mr. Gaul's works, "The Ten Virgins," had the place of honour in the programme of the Woodside Church Musical Association. The performance of the last-named cantata was also decidedly good. It may, by the way, be of interest to note that "Una" is under rehearsal by the Glasgow Academy Choir. The Kyrle Choir has invariably something of import to say for itself, and at the annual Concert, on the 12th ult., a large and influential audience enjoyed an artistic performance of Gounod's "De Profundis" and selections of an unusually high order. There was also some remarkably good music at the "At Home" given on the 9th ult. by the West of Scotland section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians. Dr. A. L. Peace delivered a short address, and acquitted himself admirably as chairman. Anderton's "Wreck of the Hesperus" formed the leading feature in the programme of the Pollokshields Philharmonic Society on the evening of the 13th ult., a cantata to which every justice was done by Mr. John Cullen's well balanced choir; and the Kelvinside Free Church Choristers must also be felicitated on their performance of Stainer's "The Crucifixion"—another signally favourite work in the Glasgow district—on the 19th ult.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Two Concerts have been given by the Philharmonic Society since the last summary of local news was written. At the first of these, on February 27, Liszt's "Legend of St. Elizabeth" was performed, and at the other, on the 13th ult., a miscellaneous programme was given. The Oratorio named above is the only really important work given this half-session by the premier Society, and there seems to be a concensus of opinion in regard to the waste of choral ability at each of the other five Concerts, where for the most part brief pieces of only secondary importance have been allotted to the choristers. The one work, however, served to maintain its credit, a very excellent reading of the Hungarian writer's music being accorded. In all respects the "Legend of St. Elizabeth," which is especially adapted to societies of large resources, received a thoroughly adequate interpretation under Sir Charles Hallé. The veteran conductor lent distinction to the second Concert of the two named in the present notice by contributing to an otherwise not particularly high-class programme a very fine reading of Beethoven's C minor Concerto. The Musical Society gave, on the 6th ult., at St. George's Hall, a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under Mr. D. O. Parry; but the effort was hardly of equal merit to previous performances by the same body of choristers, while, as to some extent shadowed forth herein a month ago, the band proved unequal to the music of the greatest of modern Oratorios. Gounod's "Redemption" was the work selected for this year's special Lenten musical services at the pro-Cathedral, and highly creditable performances resulted. Mr. Burstall, who was at the organ, had arranged that his accompaniments should be augmented by brass instruments, tympani, and harp, and while the vivid orchestral colour of Gounod's score was of necessity found wanting, a generally excellent hearing was accorded of the famous Birmingham Oratorio.

Having chronicled such a trilogy of important events, there is unfortunately but little more to be said of choral Liverpool. As stated herein over and over again, instrumental music seems always to take the lead in the second city. At the last Concert of the Sunday Society, on the 5th ult., in St. George's Hall, in addition to the regular orchestra, the services of a large military band and the grand organ were requisitioned, and a couple of thousand would-be auditors are reported to have been crowded out. The fourth Concert of the Orchestral Society took place on the 3rd ult., at the City Hall, selections from Raff's G minor Symphony and a large amount of other high-class music attracting a very large audience. Too late for present notice, Mr. E. Goossens announced a specially good programme for the 27th ult. The Societa Armonica gave a Concert on the 16th ult., and the Wirral Orchestral Society has been in evidence at Birkenhead.

On the same side of the Mersey Gade's "Crusaders" and "Spring's Message" were given by the Wallasey Musical Society, on the 12th ult., under Mr. W. I. Argent, with band and chorus of 150 performers. The same very fine cantata—the one first-named—has been in hand at Waterloo, where Mr. Appleyard conducts the leading local society; and at Birkenhead itself this gentleman has Mozart's "Requiem" in hand with the St. Cecilia Society. At Rock Ferry, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" has been given by Mr. Pemberton's Society, with small orchestra and Mustel organ accompaniment.

The recent resignation of Mr. W. T. Best, who it may be remarked has been granted a pension of £240 by the Corporation, still exercises the minds of many people, and all sorts of suggestions have been made as to his successor. One idea submitted to the committee dealing with the matter embraces the appointment of a Musical Director, who would also be the recognised Corporation Organist for public functions and the like, and who would conduct certain of the regular weekly Recitals. The chief feature of such a scheme, however, lies in the fact that, were it adopted, all the leading organists of the district would be laid under contribution, and a friendly spirit of emulation would be set up, while a continual change of musical thought would be secured. Nothing will, however, probably be settled for some little time to come at least.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The musical season is ending here rather spiritedly. Not for many years, before the 15th ult., have we had a performance of Handel's great masterpiece "Israel in Egypt," and though the rendering could not be said to have been by any means perfect, still the dignity of the choral portion was very impressive, and some inadequacy in the solos did not so much matter. Somehow the mass of orchestral sound seemed insufficient, and the two sections of the choir could not, in the Free Trade Hall, be stationed far enough apart to make the responsive phrases thoroughly effective; but they showed how vigorously Mr. Wilson had prepared them. A fortnight before a still greater audience assembled for the annual presentation of the "Elijah," and was rewarded by a rendering much more replete with point and vivified with greater spirit. Mr. Santley managed his voice carefully, reserving force for the two more important songs without depriving the minor portions of the Prophet's part of their charm of earnestness and passion. The intermediate Concert—the last of the orchestral evenings—was, in every respect, a success. A crowded house, a perfect rendering of Beethoven's Symphony (No. 4, in B flat), Dr. Joachim's playing of his "Hungarian" Concerto, and, in combination with Lady Hallé, of Spohr's Duet in D, sufficed to make a most attractive programme, which Miss Thudichum enlivened by some extremely artistic singing. She has been here several times this season, and is steadily winning her way. If she would not, sometimes, unduly force a voice which is quite strong enough for the largest room, and of far too good a quality to be recklessly treated, she would disarm the critic. Sir Charles Hallé's thirty-seventh season has thus passed by, not without vicissitudes in its earlier part, but with a brilliant ending.

Mr. Pyne's Saturday Evening Organ Recitals at the Town Hall still retain a popularity, the more remarkable when contrasted with the apparent difficulty in other towns of keeping alive an interest in such serious music. The Concerts of Mr. Cross and of Mr. Barrett compete for the patronage of the lovers of lighter works. The friends of Mr. G. W. Lane also assembled by thousands on the 10th ult., to reward him for his exertions on behalf of his Philharmonic Choir during the winter months.

At the Concert Hall, Miss Wakefield gave an interesting Lecture-recital illustrative of Schumann's songs, &c. There was much to charm, as there always is about Miss Wakefield's work; but perhaps the claims she made on behalf of her hero were rather greater than could readily be granted. A few evenings later, on the 12th ult., the attendance at the last of Mr. Willy Hess's Chamber Concerts showed the hold which the meetings are obtaining. During the short season the gatherings have grown larger and far more enthusiastic, until it becomes a question of practical politics whether, as the real lovers of music are, in the Concert Hall as in the larger Free Trade Hall, found almost exclusively in the gallery, it would not be wise to throw the whole room open at popular prices, and to get rid of the handful of chilly people who condescend to give a kind of semi-fashionable patronage to the sparsely occupied reserved seats, and discuss their domestic arrangements during the performance. The quartet playing of Messrs. Hess, Briggs, Spielman, and Fuchs in Beethoven's No. 2 of Op. 59 was perfect; and if, with the aid of Mr. Leonard Borwick, the Quintet (Op. 34) of Brahms pleased less, the fault certainly was not with the executants. For his solo Mr. Borwick selected Schumann's "Carnaval."

A similarly gradual increase of interest has followed the series of Concerts given by Messrs. Harrison, of Birmingham; and the fourth proved that, with a really good all-round programme, no exorbitantly remunerated star is needed. Mr. Lloyd rather undervalued the musical feeling of the audience. He would, if possible, have been still more loudly applauded had he chosen songs of a somewhat higher standard. The Meister Glee Singers furnished quite enough of the lighter element; and the violin and pianoforte solos of Miss Nettie Carpenter and Miss Muriel Elliott were, evidently, not above the warm appreciation of the people.

I regret that a paragraph, somehow appended to my last letter, gave increased publicity to an erroneous report, which originated, I believe, with one of the most influential of the London daily papers. The application made for a charter for the newly established College of Music here—which has already obtained Royal sanction of the most decided kind—contains no petition for power to confer "degrees." That authority belongs to, and will shortly be exercised by the Victoria University, the locale of which institute is in its senior college, viz.—the Owens College of this city. It may be interesting to some of your readers to learn that the Owens College has been the first in this country to devise a lengthened course of instruction qualifying for graduation; and that the first batch of students is now approaching the close of the third, and final, year. Each session has brought an increasing number of students, and there is now no doubt of the firm establishment of a curriculum which is qualified to turn out musicians skilled in the modern practice as well as in the ancient lore of their art. The Owens College is liberally affording all aid to the Royal Manchester College of Music, and it is to be hoped and expected that the friendly co-operation of the two institutions may be crowned with success, and that musical education here may henceforth rest upon a firmer basis than heretofore.

Dr. Watson's selection of music for the last meeting of his Vocal Society, on the 21st ult., was admirable; the balance of tone was as good as ever, and the improvement of the choir under his guidance was maintained.

The Royal Carl Rosa Company, at the Theatre Royal, is a very welcome change after a prolonged season of pantomime. During the six weeks' campaign several novelties are promised, and the "Faust" of Berlioz and the "Rienzi" of Wagner have attracted crowded audiences. It was but natural that Sir Charles Hallé should be invited here, as in Liverpool, to conduct the first performance of a work which, in England, owes so much to his persistence.

Among the smaller undertakings the Chamber Concerts of Mr. Bauerkellen and of Mr. Haddock should be mentioned.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At Longton Town Hall, on the 1st ult., Mr. F. A. Challinor, of Zion Chapel, presented his new cantata, entitled "Manhood's Springtime." The soloists were Miss Penn and Miss Walthall (of Hanley). Mr. J. Moss conducted a large choir and the work was most creditably performed.

The seventh and last of the present Meakin series of Popular Concerts was given at the Hanley Victoria Hall, on Monday, the 5th ult., and a large audience welcomed the artists. Miss Nelly Asher (vice Madame Emily Spada, indisposed), Miss Sarah Berry, Messrs. Henry Piercy, Charles Copland, Philip Cathie (violin), and Clement Locknane (pianoforte) formed the Concert-party.

The performance of "Solomon," on the 8th ult., by the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, created unusual interest in musical circles. The vigorous committee can be complimented upon the success of its efforts to introduce unknown works to the music-loving public of this industrial centre. A strong list of principals was first issued, but almost at the eleventh hour three out of the five had, through indisposition, to secure substitutes. The revised list, happily, was a strong one, and with one exception a worthy representation was given of the masterpieces. Madame Emily Squire, Miss Nellie Gosnell, Miss Jennie Rankin, Mr. James Leyland, and Mr. Shaw were the principals. The chorus, conducted by Mr. James Garner, was in excellent form and was heard to great advantage in the grand double choruses, "Shake the dome and pierce the sky" calling for special mention. A capable orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Fred. Ward (of Birmingham), rendered valuable aid, while Mr. T. Johnson, at the organ, rendered efficient service. The crowded audience displayed a lively and intelligent interest in this, the first local presentation of "Solomon," many being in attendance for over five hours.

The choir of the Hanley Presbyterian Church repeated Dr. George F. Root's "Under the Palms," on the 13th ult., before a large audience. The object was to raise funds to carry out the structural alterations of the choir seats planned by their Conductor, Mr. J. A. McGregor. Misses Walthall and Bradbury, and Messrs. W. and H. Morrey gave the solos, and the augmented choir sang the stirring music with vigour and taste. Mr. F. Walker was the Organist, and Mr. J. A. McGregor the Conductor.

The united choirs of the Wesleyan Chapels of North Staffordshire (numbering 400 voices), under the leadership of Mr. G. Butler, sang a varied selection of Part-songs at the Victoria Hall, on the 15th ult.

On the 15th ult. news reached Stoke that Dr. J. G. U. West, Chairman of the Triennial Festival Committee, and one of the honorary secretaries of the Potteries Philharmonic Society, had died at Madeira within a few hours of his arrival there. The genial kind-hearted doctor was a great favourite in local musical circles, and his loss will be severely felt in the administrative work, where his musical enthusiasm found its chief outlet.

The Duke of Sutherland presided at the Triennial Festival Committee's Financial Meeting. A balance of £24 in hand is the result of the local efforts. The customary votes of thanks closed the proceedings.

Mr. E. Boote conducted at Providence Chapel, Cobridge, on the 19th ult., an operetta, entitled "Fairy Kindheart."

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Philharmonic Choir was rewarded with a good audience on the 5th ult., when it gave a capital performance of Sullivan's "Prodigal Son." The recent change of policy, in occasionally performing oratorios or cantatas as a change from a continuous round of unaccompanied part-songs, &c., is apparently bringing good results, inasmuch as already, within twelve months, three works little known in Nottingham have been performed, and the public interest in the doings of this fine choir has increased. The principals on this occasion were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Jessie Marshall-Ward, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Dan Price. A full orchestra was engaged, and the performance of the Oratorio and the miscellaneous second part, under the direction of Mr. Marshall-Ward, left little to be desired.

On the 8th ult. Mr. William Allen gave his last Classical Concert for the season. The executants were Dr. Joachim, Herr Willy Hess, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, Herr Carl Fuchs, Mr. J. Holme, and Miss Cantelo. Bach's Double Violin Concerto in D minor was splendidly performed by Dr. Joachim, Herr Willy Hess, and Miss Cantelo; the latter also played Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata. Other pieces in the programme (which, despite its length, was eagerly listened to) were Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25) and Mendelssohn's Posthumous String Quintet in B flat (Op. 87). A large audience warmly greeted Dr. Joachim.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave "St. Paul" on the 15th ult., the principals being Miss Medora Henson, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills. With a fine band, and the chorus of the Society under the direction of Mr. John Adcock, nothing but a good rendering could be expected; the principals contributing to the excellence of the performance. Rumours of the intentions of the Committee as to next season point to a continuance of their very conservative leanings to old or well-tried favourites, whether in oratorio or in the modern craze for operatic recitals. There is no prospect at all of the Society doing anything with its now splendid resources in the production of some of the fine works of the modern English school.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, the Organist of Exeter College, has been very much before the musical public of Oxford during the last term. At the beginning of it, the University Dramatic Society brought out some charming incidental music to "The Tempest," composed by him for its rather limited orchestral resources; and at the end (March 1) he made his first appearance as Conductor of the Choral and Philharmonic Society. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which was the work chosen for this occasion, is not exactly an easy thing on which to commence with a comparatively strange band and chorus; but the performance was a very good one, the main defect being some raggedness in the strings. Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Dora Barnard, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Norman Salmond were excellent in the solo parts, and the Society and its new Conductor are to be congratulated on the success that was achieved. One most hopeful sign of the growth of an artistic spirit here was that the large audience reserved their applause for the close of each part.

Mr. Farmer's Concerts at Balliol College have been resumed after an interval. Their chief features have been a programme of chamber music for wind instruments and a performance of Mr. Farmer's "Requiem" in memory of the late Master of the College. There was a large orchestra of excellent players, who had an opportunity of displaying their skill in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The public Classical Concerts, thanks to Dr. Joachim, who played twice, have again been a financial success. Three of the series were given during the Lent Term: two chamber music programmes, which elicited a somewhat lukewarm interest, and an Orchestral Concert, the programme of which included Beethoven's Violin Concerto for Dr. Joachim. Such an attraction naturally drew a very large audience, and the Concert was in every respect the best ever given in this series.

Sir John Stainer's Lecture on "St. Paul" is dealt with elsewhere. On the 8th ult. the Rev. F. L. Cohen lectured (for the Professor) on "Traditional Synagogue Music." The lecturer proved most learned and interesting throughout; his theories as to the preservation of the traditional tunes by the Jews of Northern Europe and as to the true interpretation of the headings of the Psalms were especially striking. But certainly the most impressive portion of the programme was the illustrations that were sung by Mrs. Cohen. Not for many years has a singer with such a beautiful voice and admirable method been heard in Oxford, and the Synagogue melodies, as sung by her, will not readily fade from the memories of those who were fortunate enough to hear them.

Of ordinary Concerts it is impossible to give any account—they were innumerable. It must suffice to say that amongst the artists of distinction who have played or sung here during the eight weeks of term have been—Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Fillunger, Mrs. Trust, the late Madame Patey, Miss Una Bruckshaw, Madame Bertha Moore, Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Watkin Mills, Herr Schönberger, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. Whitehouse, Mr. Frederick Dawson, Mr. Sauret, and the Meister Glee Singers. It can hardly be thought strange that many of these had to perform to an audience quite unworthy of their merits.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Lenten season brings musical matters to a standstill here, and there is very little to record this month.

Mr. Alfred Foley's new Society, which he has named the Salisbury Philharmonic Society, gave its first Concert on the 29th ult., too late for detailed notice. In addition to Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," the programme included some good choral numbers, amongst them being the Bridal Chorus from Cowen's "Rose Maiden." The chorus numbered nearly a hundred, and there was a fairly complete orchestra led by Mr. Frank Bartlett. Miss Elsie Mackenzie, Miss Rica Wrightson, and Mr. Alfred Wetten were the principal vocalists, and Miss Awdry, a talented lady amateur, played a Scarlatti-Tausig Pastorale and "Concert dans les bois" (Schmidt) as pianoforte solos. The Conductor was Mr. Foley, and the Rev. H. W. Carpenter officiated as accompanist.

The Wilts Oratorio Society, of which Mr. Edwin Nunn is the Conductor, is preparing Bach's cantata "My spirit was in heaviness" and Haydn's "Creation," to be performed at the forthcoming Concert, which will take place next month at Devizes.

The next Concert of the Southampton Philharmonic Society will take place on the 17th inst., when Sir Joseph Barnby's cantata "Rebekah" will be performed under the direction of the composer.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At Leeds the Subscription Concerts came to an end on February 28. Sir Charles Hallé, with his band of eighty performers, supplied a most interesting programme of orchestral music, including such masterpieces as Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Oberon" and "Tannhäuser" Overtures. To Schubert's lovely music the fullest justice was done, and it is not often we have heard it so sympathetically played. Miss Eisele, a pianist who has recently settled in Leeds, played Beethoven's great Concerto in E flat with ability and vigour, being particularly successful in the first and second movements. Mr. Watkin Mills sang Wotan's "Abschied" which, though so familiar to London audiences, had never before been heard in Leeds, with great power and just expression; but his fine voice was heard to greater advantage in the less exacting baritone air from "La Reine de Saba." The past season of these Concerts has been unusually successful. The subscription list has been the largest on record, and the net result is that a balance of fully £200 remains towards the expenses of next season, to which the committee are looking with a lighter heart than usual. On the 9th ult. there were two Concerts of some importance in Leeds. Mr. Christensen gave the second of his Concerts, and was assisted by Messrs. E. Elliott (violin) and A. Bolton (violoncello) in a performance of Beethoven's great B flat Trio, together with some lighter compositions by the Concert-giver. Mr. B. Bury was the vocalist. The Railway Servants' Annual Concert in aid of their Orphan Fund has become a very popular institution, thanks chiefly to Mr. F. R. Spark, whose influence has been exerted to obtain the gratuitous help of artists of the highest standing. At the Concert which took place on the 9th ult., Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Watkin Mills were his chief attractions. Madame Stone Barton, Miss Rosa Green, Messrs. Alfred Hollins (pianist) and Gilbert Jackson (tenor) also took part in a programme requiring no description, but giving pleasure to a large audience. On the 13th ult. Mr. Edgar Haddock gave one of his Musical Evenings. The clever performances of Master Cyril Tyler, the juvenile vocal phenomenon, were the sensation of the evening. Miss Ella Russell, being an adult, was less sensational, though she sang finely. Mr. Carl Fuchs was the violoncellist, Miss Maude Cater the pianist, and Mr. Haddock himself the violinist.

The Concert given on the 14th ult. by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Alfred Broughton is the Conductor, was of unusual interest. Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" and Sullivan's "Kenilworth," both written for a Birmingham Festival just thirty years ago, are so seldom heard as to be regarded as revivals. The chief point of interest in the programme, however, was a cantata by Mr. F. Kilvington Hattersley, written specially for the Society. "King Robert of Sicily" is taken from Longfellow's poem of the same name, and the story of King Robert's pride, humiliation, and repentance is so suited for musical treatment as to make it a matter for surprise it has not before been made more use of by composers. It is laid out by Mr. Hattersley for soprano, tenor, and two basses as principals, together with chorus and orchestra. The music is as varied and interesting as the poem. The melodies are spontaneous and the treatment highly dramatic. The fullest use is made of the orchestra to obtain picturesque and striking effects, and for the most part with good results. The parts for the instruments of percussion would, however, bear pruning. The vocal writing presents a good many difficulties, and perhaps it might in a few places be possible to improve the declamation; but both chorus and solo parts are always vigorous and individual. The performance suffered from want of preparation so far as the band was concerned—indeed, we understand that circumstances made it impossible to have a single full rehearsal. The chorus, however, was excellent, and of the principals Miss Medora Henson and Mr. Andrew Black left nothing to be desired. Mr. Iver McKay, who took the tenor part, was apparently not sufficiently familiar with the music to be able to do it justice. Mr. T. J. Bellingham was an efficient representative of the second baritone part. Mr. Hattersley conducted his cantata, which was very warmly received. It is certainly so interesting a work as to warrant the belief that it will prove popular with choral societies.

The Bradford Permanent Orchestral Society has given two Concerts since we last wrote. On February 24 the Overtures "Ruy Blas" and "Di Ballo" (Sullivan) were played with great spirit under Mr. W. B. Sewell's direction. Miss Isabella Donkersley's very artistic performance of Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor was the most important feature of the Concert, Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony supplying a lighter element. Miss Annie Albu was the vocalist. At the last Concert of the season, on the 10th ult., Dr. Charles Vincent conducted his "Storm" Overture, or orchestral ballad, a musical illustration of Longfellow's "Wreck of the Hesperus." In this clever work, while keeping to the main lines of the classical overture, the composer has followed every detail of the ballad with great ingenuity. Even the dialogues between the dramatis personæ are represented by instrumental passages, and Dr. Vincent does not shrink from attempting to illustrate musically such an incident as that in which "the Skipper, after two bars' meditation, blows a whiff from his pipe, and laughs a scornful laugh." It may be doubted whether the gain from such minute tone-painting is commensurate with the trouble and ingenuity expended over it, but there can be no doubt of the skill and musicianship shown in the composition. Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto was very dashingly played by Mr. Fred. Dawson, and Miss Marie Lummert was the vocalist. On the 2nd ult. the last of the Bradford Subscription Concerts took place. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto, played with the utmost refinement by Lady Hallé, and Cherubini's Overture, composed for the Philharmonic Society, were the most important features of an admirable programme. The performances by Sir Charles Hallé's fine band were of a very high level of excellence. Madame Vasquez was the vocalist, and sang pieces from "Tannhäuser," "Cavalleria," and "Pagliacci." Her vibrato was too persistent for her singing to be altogether acceptable. On the 9th ult. the Bradford Old Choral Society gave Handel's "Samson," the principals being Madame Emily Squire, Miss Sarah Berry, Messrs. J. Leyland and W. Thornton. The choruses were sung with power, under Mr. Hartwell Robert Shaw's able conductorship. On the 16th ult. Berlioz's "Faust" was performed by the Bradford Festival Choral Society, of which Mr. W. H. Garland is the Conductor. The principals were Miss Medora Henson, Messrs. Iver McKay and Watkin Mills. The performance was of unusual excellence, the band being the most complete and efficient the Society has ever got together. Mr. Mills's fine impersonation of Mephistopheles was a prominent feature of the performance.

The chief work in the programme of the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society's Concert, on February 27, was Mr. Gaul's cantata "Joan of Arc." The performance was a good one, but it cannot be said that the work was quite worthy of the powers of the Society, being better fitted for village choral societies. Miss Rose Long, Messrs. Lloyd James and Riley were the soloists, and Mr. J. E. Ibeson was the Conductor. On the 6th ult. the eleventh of the Subscription Concerts took place, and proved one of the least interesting of the series. Miss Rosina Isidor, Madame Alice Gomez, Mr. P. Newbury, and Mr. H. Thorndike were the vocalists, Mr. Max Pauer the pianist, and Mr. Ronchini the violoncellist. The last Concert of the series was given on the 20th ult., the London Military Band and the choir of the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society supplying the chief part of the programme. On the 9th ult. a fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given by the Huddersfield Choral Society. Mr. Andrew Black was a thoroughly satisfactory representative of the title-rôle; Miss Thudichum's fine voice was heard to advantage in the soprano part, though it was at times a trifle too prominent in the concerted music; Miss Marian McKenzie had an easy task in the contralto music, and the only member of the quartet whose singing was unworthy of the occasion was the tenor, Mr. Kelson Truman, whose exaggerated style was anything but commendable. Mr. John Bowling conducted.

On February 20 the Hull Vocal Society gave a Concert, at which Cowen's cantata "St. John's Eve" and Schubert's "Miriam's Song" were the principal features. Miss Carter, Miss Jessie Langford, Messrs. Brozel and Aston were the soloists. Mr. J. W. Hudson conducted, and in the second half of the programme an agreeable "Intermezzo" of his own composition was performed. On the 9th ult. the Batley Choral Society, under Mr. Bowling, gave a Concert performance of "The Bohemian Girl," a work bearing this treatment better than operas of more dramatic texture. The soloists were Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Lily Moody, Messrs. John Child and Chas. Manners. Balfe's work was also given by the Morley Choral Society, on the 14th ult., under Mr. A. Benton; Miss Ada Lee, Messrs. Blagbro and Thornton being the principal vocalists. On the 8th ult. the Halifax Choral Society, of which Mr. Garland is the Conductor, gave a Concert the programme of which consisted of the first part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," followed by Handel's "Acis and Galatea." Save that the orchestra was not able to do complete justice to Mendelssohn's music, the performances were excellent. Mr. Ffrangcon Davies's singing of the air "O God, have mercy," could hardly be surpassed for sincere and unexaggerated expression. Miss Medora Henson, Miss Edith Wilson, and Messrs. Blagbro and Brearley were thoroughly at home in their respective parts. Mr. Blagbro's singing of "Love in her eyes sits playing" deserving especial mention for its perfect refinement. The chorus showed intelligence and an exceptionally finished vocal style. On the same date the Barnsley St. Cecilia Society gave Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," under Mr. Alfred Benton's direction, to a crowded audience. The principals, Miss Amelia Sinico, Miss Annie Roberts, Mr. J. D. Trotter, and Mr. J. Ridding, were thoroughly at home in their music, and the chorus was heard to advantage in the "Regina Cœli." Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was the subject of the Dewsbury Choral Society's final Concert on the 13th ult. The performance was one of considerable excellence "all round," and presented several interesting features, the readings adopted by the Society's Conductor, Mr. G. H. Hirst, showing much thoughtfulness and individuality. The principal soloists were Madame Adelaide Mullen, Miss Sarah Berry, Messrs. H. Beaumont and David Hughes. Of these, Miss Berry distinguished herself most, the beauty of her voice and her unaffected style being worthy of the highest praise. On the 14th ult. the Cleckheaton Philharmonic Society gave a miscellaneous Concert. Mr. Willy Hess's masterly violin playing was the chief feature of the Concert, in which Madame Mullen, Mr. H. Beaumont, and Mr. Douglas Powell also took part. Some part-songs were sung, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Wright.

On the 8th ult. a Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given by Mr. E. E. H. Norris, at Rotherham. With Mr. Bromley

Booth as violinist, the Concert-giver was heard in Beethoven's Sonata in A minor (Op. 23). Mr. Booth's powers were well displayed in the brilliant Rondo Capriccioso of Saint-Saëns, and Mr. Norris played a very varied selection of pianoforte music with much taste and ability. Miss Margaret Hoare was the vocalist. The Keighley Musical Union gave a very creditable performance of "Israel in Egypt," on the 20th ult. Miss Bond was the soprano soloist, Miss Berry—whose singing of "Thou shalt bring them in" was the most finished performance of the evening—the contralto, and Mr. W. Evans, the tenor. The chorus, under Mr. A. Burnley's conductorship, was powerful, but occasionally seemed to lack a sufficiently intimate acquaintance with the music.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual performance of "The Messiah" at Christmas by the Philharmonic has become such an established success that the Society has decided to produce the "Creation" annually during Lent. The first annual performance took place at the Windsor Hall on the 7th ult., and the size and the enthusiasm of the audience effectually banished any doubts which might remain in the minds of the Committee as to the wisdom of the step they have taken. The chorus and orchestra numbered 275 and an excellent performance was given. Mrs. Mina Schilling, of New York, made a very successful début in Montreal. Mr. W. H. Rieger did full justice to the tenor music, and Mr. Conrad Behrens sang the parts of Raphael and Adam.

The Society comes before the public in April, on the occasion of its Fifth Annual Festival, with a programme of exceptional merit, which is attracting more than local interest. The first Concert will be devoted to Grieg, the cantata "Olav Trygvason" being produced for the first time in America. At the last Concert, Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" will be given in full.

On the 8th ult. the fourth of the Clapham Philharmonic Concerts took place at the Clapham Assembly Rooms, the work performed being nothing less than Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's beautiful and powerful Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon." The work is not an easy one, although, on the other hand, it presents no difficulties which an average choir could not surmount if the necessary amount of enthusiasm—without which, according to Schumann, nothing genuine is accomplished in art—is brought to bear on it. If the performance under notice was not altogether as good as could have been desired by admirers of Dr. Mackenzie's chef d'œuvre, or as previous achievements of the Society led us to expect it to be, it yet presented some commendable features, and it was at any rate received with liberal applause, which testified to the pleasure which the large audience derived from the music and its interpretation. The soloists were Miss Lily Seddon, Miss Clara Spencer, Mr. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. St. Clair Stott. Miss Seddon was a sympathetic Sulamite. Her voice is a clear, though not powerful, soprano, of agreeable timbre, and she sings with refinement and expression. She made a considerable impression with the beautiful setting of "The Lord is my Shepherd," which opens the second part. Mr. Sydney H. Hann, Mr. Harold Jenner, and Mr. J. P. Attwater played the accompaniments on two grands and a harmonium, and Mr. Walter Mackway was the Conductor.

Mr. J. T. Hutchinson's Concert at Queen's Hall (small hall), on the 13th ult., included some excellent examples of English part-music—among them Mr. Edward German's setting of "Orpheus with his lute" and Henry Smart's "Rest thee on this mossy pillow"—rendered by a competent choir, under the direction of the Concert-giver. Miss Agnes Larkcom well earned the applause she received for her bright singing of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "What does little birdie say?" and of the old melody "When Love is kind." Mr. J. T. Hutchinson was specially successful in his delivery of Hatton's "The lark now leaves his wat'ry nest" and "To Anthea" (given with much spirit), Gerard F. Cobb's "A Serenade," and Gounod's "Medjé." He was also associated with Madame Larkcom in the duo "Relevez-vous" ("Philemon et Baucis"). Other contributors were Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, with violoncello solos; Mr. Charles Fry, who besides reciting a scene from "As You Like It" and "The Hindoo's Paradise" (as an encore), was joined by Miss Olive Kennett (a young lady possessed of a rich voice and distinct dramatic talent) in the quarrel scene from "The School for Scandal"; and Mrs. Alice Dunn.

Sir Charles and Lady Hallé had no reason to complain of lack of appreciation of their performances at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on February 24, by a crowded audience. The programme was lengthy, but had it contained several more pieces the listeners would not have tired of the finished art of the interpreters. The famous pianist selected for his first solo the "Moonlight" Sonata of Beethoven, the peculiarly poetic spirit of which he reflected with his wonted skill, and when he next appeared alone upon the platform played Chopin's Study in C sharp minor (Op. 25, No. 7) and Impromptu in F sharp (Op. 36). Lady Hallé was at her very best in Gade's Caprice in A minor and the "Three Irish Pieces"—"A Lament" in D minor, "Hush Song" in F major, and "Reel" in D major—of Professor Stanford. The hearty applause with which they had been separately greeted became enthusiastic when the celebrated pair came on together to render "Three Fantasiestücke" of Schumann for pianoforte and violin and the Grand Sonata in A minor of Rubinstein, with the latter of which the successful Recital terminated.

The Hampstead Choral Society is entitled to warm commendation for a spirited and careful performance, on the 12th ult., at the local Vestry Hall, of Dr. Hubert Parry's "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso" and Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night." The union of the two compositions in a single programme was a happy idea—they were exactly of the right length; whilst the calm stateliness of the one brought out with increased effect the weird and impulsive attributes of the other. Mrs. B. L. Rhein and Mr. E. Steane Price were quite equal to the solos of "L'Allegro," and the same gentleman did excellent service with Miss Helen Pettican and Mr. Charles J. Garratt in the "Walpurgis." Miss Mabel Coenen was at the pianoforte and Mr. Robert Sladdin at the harmonium. Mr. Willem Coenen, who conducted throughout with unfailing judgment and decision, between the parts manifested his powers as a pianist by playing Liszt's "Barcarolle" and Grieg's "Prière et Danse Religieuse." At this stage of the Concert Miss Helen Pettican also sang Mr. Coenen's "The Changeling."

The London Sunday School Choir held its annual Festival at the Royal Albert Hall on February 24, under the conductorship of Mr. Luther Hinton, and with Mr. David Davies at the organ. The selected force of a thousand voices showed a further advance on former years in the matters of precision and regard for expression. Sir Joseph Barnby's hymn "The Sower went forth sowing" and Gaul's "Morning," both specially composed for the celebration of the majority of the Choir last year, were advantageously brought into the programme. The other choral successes included Gounod's "Come unto Him," Tours's anthem "Blessed are they that dwell," "To Thee, Cherubim" (Handel's Dettingen Te Deum), and Hatton's "Stars of the summer night." The affiliated orchestra gave several works creditably, and for solo vocalists there were Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Lizzie Neal, and Miss Kate Cove. The annual summer gathering at the Crystal Palace, with two Concerts on the Handel Festival Orchestra, is fixed for June 13.

Dr. and Mrs. Creser's Organ and Vocal Recital, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 10th ult., attracted a numerous assemblage. The ability of the Chapel Royal Organist was displayed in his own ingenious and effective Sonata in A minor, which undoubtedly interested; the Prelude, Bridal March, and Chorus from "Lohengrin"; Lott's Pastorale "The Storm," Guilmant's striking "Marche Funèbre et chant Séraphique," a Fantasia Concertante by Petrali, an "Andante con moto, alla marcia," by Peace, and a Toccata by Dubois. Upon his execution of the Wagner excerpts and Guilmant's

March Dr. Creser was complimented with more than ordinary warmth. Mrs. Creser's expressive and artistic singing of "Thy voice revives my heart" ("Samson et Dalila"), Cowen's "The Promise of Life," Balfe's "The green trees whispered," and other pieces was also recognised in the most spontaneous manner.

We are pleased to observe that music occupies an important place in the curriculum of the Battersea Polytechnic Institute. The head of this department is Dr. Ralph Dunstan. The need, in Battersea, of high-class musical instruction at popular prices, is shown by the fact that already over 650 students have joined the various music classes at the Polytechnic. This number includes: pianoforte, 170 students; choral class, 110; violin and violoncello, 70; Staff Notation (singing), 60; orchestral band, 45; military band, 30; Tonic Sol-fa, 30; theory, harmony, and counterpoint, 30; piccolo, flute, and clarinet, 25. Dr. Dunstan is assisted by Miss Mary Thomas, formerly Merchant Taylors' Scholar at the National Training School of Music; Miss Augusta J. Foster, Mr. R. Stokoe, Organist of Christchurch, Mayfair; and Miss Emily Hardy, for several years pupil of the late Mr. Sainton.

Apparently as much interest attached to the Concert-room performance of Gounod's "Faust," at the Queen's Hall, on the 3rd ult., as to those previously given of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," for the spacious room was equally well filled. That Mr. Edward Lloyd displayed great charm of voice in the music of the titular character goes without saying, and Miss Antoinette Trebelli sang with welcome refinement as Margaret. A new-comer, Miss Rosa Green, displayed an excellent mezzo-soprano voice in the dual parts of Siebel and Martha, and great promise was shown by Mr. Harrison Brockbank as Valentine; Mr. Santley sang the music of Mephistopheles extremely well, as a matter of course, but his manner was not sufficiently cynical and sardonic. The orchestra was better than the chorus, the latter wanting the dramatic grip necessary for operatic music. Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted with noteworthy skill.

The Hampstead Popular Concerts season was brought to a brilliant termination on February 23, in the Vestry Hall, by the appearance of Dr. Joachim, with whom were associated Miss Fanny Davies, Messrs. Ludwig, Gibson, and Whitehouse. The eminent violinist was most cordially received by a crowded audience, and it is needless to say that he held their attention throughout Beethoven's String Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), Brahms's Sonata in D minor (Op. 108) for pianoforte and violin, and Schubert's Trio for pianoforte and strings in E flat (Op. 100). Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in B minor (Op. 35, No. 3) was the solo selected for the display of Miss Fanny Davies's skill. Mr. Bispham acquitted himself well in songs by Brahms, Schumann, and Wagner, the accompaniments to which were ably rendered by Mr. Henry Bird.

Mr. Algernon Ashton is a musician of such high artistic aim that he should not be lightly blamed for giving Concerts made up entirely of his own compositions, though it cannot be concealed that the performance at the Princes' Hall, on the 7th ult., was not free from monotony. The most pleasing features were four "Lively Pieces" for pianoforte and violoncello, and three English Dances for pianoforte duet (Op. 10). More ambitious, and certainly not altogether unsuccessful, were a recently composed Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin, and a Pianoforte Quartet in C minor, in which the influence of the modern German school is strongly apparent. Mr. Ashton showed himself an able pianist, and received effective assistance from Mr. Gompertz, Mr. Alfred Hobday, Mr. W. H. Squire, Miss Marjorie Eaton, and Mr. William Paull.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave the second Members' Concert for the present season on the 5th ult., at the Queen's Hall, which was crowded in every part. Somewhat undue ambition was displayed in the selection of the programme, Beethoven's Symphony in C minor and Wagner's Overture to "Die Meistersinger" being rather too much for Mr. Norfolk Megone's gallant band—though let it be gladly admitted that there were many good points in the rendering of these works. The playing, however, was more satisfactory in the ballet movements from Moszkowski's opera "Boabdil" and Mr. Edward German's piquant "Gipsy Suite." Miss Agnes Janson and Master Cyril Tyler contributed vocal pieces, and Miss Alice Maud Liebmann violin solos, all with much effect.

Miss Lottie Williams prepared an attractive list of vocal and instrumental pieces for her Concert at the Hampstead Vestry Hall, on February 22. After taking part with Mr. A. J. Slocombe (violin) and Mr. B. P. Parker in the Andante and Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, she played with considerable neatness lighter pianoforte compositions by Chopin, Schumann, and Mendelssohn respectively, besides assisting the Misses Slocombe and Ambrose as accompanists. Messrs. Slocombe and Parker also gave some solos. Miss Lilian Redfern and Mr. Henry Pope were called upon to repeat Smart's duet "When the wind bloweth in from the sea," and the other vocalists were Miss Hélène Vivienne Ambrose and Mr. David James.

Pianoforte Recitals have, so far, been few in number during the present season, and, judging by the slender attendance at the performance of Miss Ilona Eibenschütz at St. James's Hall, on the 7th ult., musical amateurs are not sorry to be spared for a time from these rather monotonous entertainments. The young German pianist, however, should be congratulated on her artistic and energetic rendering of the whole of Brahms's new pieces (Op. 118 and 119), nine in number, of which she had already performed five at the Popular Concerts on more than one occasion; and also for the vigour she infused into her interpretation of Schubert's lengthy and rarely-heard Sonata in D (Op. 53) and Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques.

A very attractive programme offered by the Westminster Orchestral Society on the 7th ult., at the Westminster Town Hall, drew an overflowing audience; but critical remarks need not be lengthy, as the material and the executants were alike familiar to the frequenters of high-class Concerts. Sir Charles and Lady Hallé assisted, the former playing Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto and the latter Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, the two distinguished artists joining in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata. As regards the manner in which these works were rendered, it would be entirely superfluous to speak. Gade's melodious and genial Symphony in B flat (No. 4) was included in the scheme, and Miss Liza Lehmann was, as usual, entirely acceptable as the vocalist.

A very successful Concert was given by the Army and Navy Auxiliary Stores Musical Club, at the Westminster Town Hall, on the 6th ult. The programme was a varied one, and included the cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" (Van Bree), in which the solo parts were creditably sustained by Miss Stella Maris and Mr. Stirling Wells; also an arrangement of a selection from Offenbach's "Orphée aux Enfers," with choral and orchestral accompaniment by J. Darch, the Conductor of the club band. Considering the material at his command and the limited amount of time for rehearsals, the Conductor (Mr. C. E. Weekes) may fairly be congratulated on the amount of good work done during the past season.

The Brighton and Hove Choral Society announces three Concerts to be given as usual during the year. The first, on the 5th inst., will be a Gounod Concert, and will include "The Requiem" from "Mors et Vita" and the Garden Scene and Ballet music from "Faust." On June 7, Gluck's "Orpheus" will be given, and in December, Berlioz's "Faust" will be performed for the first time in Brighton. The Society has, under Dr. Sawyer's able direction, done good work during the ten years of its existence; and its local influence will now be increased by the patronage of the Duke of Connaught (Earl of Sussex), the Lord Lieutenant of the County, and other distinguished personages.

Excellent performances of Gounod's "Redemption" and Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion music were given during the Lenten season in St. Peter's, Eaton Square, under the direction of Mr. W. de Manby Sergison. The solos were well sung by members of the choir, and the choruses rendered in an impressive manner. The "Redemption" has also attracted large congregations at St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens, where it was given during Lent in alternation with Stainer's "Crucifixion," under the direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge, Organist of the Church. The capabilities of the new organ, recently erected by Messrs. Willis, were admirably displayed at these performances.

A Concert of sacred music, of which Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was the chief feature, was given on the 8th ult., by the Dulwich Grove Choral Society, at the Congregational Church, East Dulwich. Miss Kate Munro, Miss Alice Mockford, and Mr. Douglas St. Aubyn were the solo vocalists; and the orchestral accompaniments were played by members of the South London Institute orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse. That clever violinist also played Mackenzie's Benedictus and Handel's Largo; and solos on the violoncello were contributed by Mr Leo Taussig. Mr. W. J. Tidmarsh was at the organ, and Mr. Albert Mottley conducted.

"The Messiah" was performed at the Queen's Hall on the 20th ult., in aid of the philanthropic work of the London Congregational Union. Notwithstanding the announcement of a band and chorus numbering 400, and of such an efficient solo quartet as Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Norman Salmond, the attendance in the higher-priced seats was scanty. The chorus sang throughout with energy, and the four principals acquitted themselves so satisfactorily as to elicit warm applause. Mr. James W. Lewis proved a watchful and thoroughly qualified Conductor, and Mr. Fountain Meen was at the organ.

Miss Annie Watkins gave an attractive Concert on the 16th ult., at the Athenæum, Camden Road. The Concert-giver, who was heard to advantage in several songs, including Donizetti's "O mio Fernando," was ably assisted by Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Frank Bristol, Mr. John Cross, and Mr. Arthur Strugnell. Not the least enjoyable portions of the programme were the recitations given by Mr. Charles Fry, which were greatly appreciated by the audience. Mr. F. S. Southgate combined the duties of accompanist and solo pianist in an admirable manner.

An attractive Organ and Vocal Recital was given on the 12th ult., in Christ Church, Endell Street. The programme, which contained an admirable selection of excerpts from well-known works, also included an anthem, "All Thy works praise Thee," of considerable importance, by Mr. C. B. Kaye, in which the solo parts were ably sung by Mrs. W. Creyke, Miss R. Longland, Mr. R. Raynham, and Mr. Jode. These artists, with Miss Sargeant, also rendered other vocal pieces in the programme, and Mr. Kaye played several organ solos.

The Welsh Choral Festival in St. Paul's Cathedral, on February 28, the eve of St. David's Day, brought together a very large number of natives of the Principality. The choir consisted of about 300 voices, conducted by Mr. Dyved Lewis, and could not be accused of half-heartedness in the discharge of duty. Mr. David J. Thomas had specially composed for the occasion a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and throughout the service presided at the organ. Both as a creative and executive musician his efforts obtained approval.

Mr. Clement Locknane gave a Concert on February 26, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, when he was assisted by Miss Nellie Asher, Madame Belle Cole, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Henry Piercy, Mr. d'Arcy Clayton, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. Barrington Foote. The Concert-giver played Grieg's Sonata in C for pianoforte and violin, with Mr. Philip Cathie, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's Incidental Music to the "Dream of Eugene Aram," recited by Mr. Charles Fry. Mr. Locknane was also represented by several of his successful songs.

At the ninth Oratorio Service of the present series at St. Matthew's Church, Denmark Hill, on Maunday Thursday, Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung, the soloists being Messrs. Holliday and Wilding. On Thursday, the 8th ult., a selection from "The Messiah" was given, the soloists being Messrs. Jackson, Holliday, and Wilding. There was no orchestra, but the accompaniments were effectively rendered on the organ by Dr. J. Warriner, Organist of the Church.

Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given at St. James's, Clapton, on the 1st ult., by the choral society attached to the church. The chorus of 100 voices showed evidence of very careful training. The instrumental portion of the work was well given by the Chandos Orchestra, assisted by Mr. Alfred Cox at the harmonium. Miss Ada Quail, Mrs. Wilbraham, Mr. George Clues, and Mr. Arthur Beckwith were the soloists, and Mr. Percy Taylor conducted.

Two special Lenten Musical Services were held at South Hackney Parish Church, on Thursday evenings, the 1st and 8th ult., when a very creditable rendering of Part I. of Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the choir. The principal solo parts were well sustained by Messrs. Ulrich and Harding and Master T. Couldrey. Mr. Fountain Meen ably presided at the organ; and Mr. John E. West, Organist and Director of the Choir, conducted.

At All Saints', South Lambeth, on February 27, a selection from "St. Paul" was given by the Church Oratorio Choir, numbering nearly 100 voices, supplemented by organ, trombones, and trumpet. The soloists were Miss Fullerton Bell, Mr. A. Adams, and Mr. C. Rolfe. Mr. Walter Attersoll, Organist of the Church, conducted, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart presided at the organ.

The London Male Voice Club, under the conductorship of Mr. W. de Manby Sergison, gave, on the 13th ult., at Anderton's Hotel, a successful performance of glees, madrigals, and part-songs. These were sung with admirable spirit and finish, and the enjoyment of the evening was enhanced by the vocal solos sung by Mr. F. Usher Hobbs and Mr. Balfour, and the pianoforte playing of Mr. A. Vine.

The first Concert of the Waldegrave Choral Society took place in the Waldegrave Road Church on the 21st ult., when the work chosen was Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." The soloists engaged were Madame L. Barrett, Miss Ada Shrigley, Miss Ida Kingston, Mr. L. Fryer, and Mr. R. Grice. Mr. E. Carrick presided at the organ, and Mr. A. Fairbairn conducted.

A Lecture, entitled "Description in Music," was given in the Lecture Hall connected with Eccleston Square Church, on the 15th ult., by Mr. Henry A. Evans, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church. The instrumental illustrations were played on the pianoforte by Miss Gross and Miss Arnold, and the vocal examples were sung by Miss Bessie Spells and Mr. Charles H. Anderton.

Mr. F. A. Jewson gave a successful Organ Recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute on the 10th ult. The programme included pieces by Handel, Mendelssohn, Le Jeune, F. Rosé, Rossini, Mascagni, and others. The vocalists were Madame Recoschewitz, Miss Mildred Shonbridge, Miss Florence Croft, and Mr. d'Arcy Clayton.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance, on the 7th ult., of Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," at St. Peter's, Hoxton Square. The soloists were Miss Regina Atwater, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. A. Appleby. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

Mr. G. Shinn's new Oratorio, "Lazarus in Bethany," was given at Railton Road Chapel, Herne Hill, on the 12th ult. The band and chorus of sixty performers, conducted by the composer, rendered the concerted pieces with vigour and effect, and an excellent quartet of solo voices contributed to make the performance highly successful.

On the 16th and 21st ult. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung in St. Thomas's Church, Finsbury Park, by the choir, conducted by Mr. A. Newton. The soloists were Mr. Frank Saunders and Mr. H. J. Dunn; Mr. H. Davis presiding at the organ.

Mr. Ebenezer Prout has made an interesting discovery, at the Foundling Hospital, of MS. copies of Handel's music, and will publish particulars in the Monthly Musical Record for April.

During Lent, Gounod's "Daughters of Jerusalem" and Stainer's "Crucifixion" have been sung at St. Michael's, Paddington, under the direction of Mr. Edmund Rogers, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Altenburg.—The well-known song-writer, E. Meyer-Helmund, has once more tried his hand at a comic opera, which was produced with fair success at the Court Theatre here, on the 4th ult. It is in one act; its title is "Trischka," and the heroine is the dancer, Taglioni, whose terpsichorean performances save her life when she has the misfortune to fall into the hands of a band of brigands. Needless to say, ballet music plays an important part in the work.

Berlin.—Since Hans von Bülow's lamented death a number of more or less successful and appropriate "In Memoriam" concerts have been given by the leading choral and orchestral societies here. Thus the Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Siegfried Ochs performed, inter alia, two choral works by Beethoven ("Elegischer Gesang") and Brahms ("Schicksalslied"), while the Stern'sche Verein chose the deceased master's own "Funerale" for orchestra and Verdi's "Requiem"—the latter a significant selection!——Verdi's "Falstaff" was, on the 6th ult., given for the first time in German at the Royal Opera and achieved a far greater success than last summer, when it was performed by an Italian troupe. The veteran Betz was an admirable Falstaff and the rendering of the work generally thoroughly adequate.——It is said that the German Emperor has commissioned Signor Leoncavallo to write a grand historical opera, the plot of which is to be founded on an episode from Prussian history. The General Intendant of the Court Theatre was asked to find a suitable subject, and he has selected Willibald von Alexis's novel "Der Roland von Berlin," the hero of which is the Elector Frederic II. of Brandenburg. We wonder what German composers think of this.

Bonn.—The programme of the last Subscription Concert of the Städtische Gesangverein, on the 1st ult., consisted of the first five tableaux from Rubinstein's sacred opera "Moses." The performance was excellent, and the reception of the novelty favourable.

Bremen.—Max Bruch's newest work, "Leonidas," for baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra (Op. 66), was, on the 1st ult., produced here, under the direction of the composer.

Brunswick.—Wagner's "Tristan" has at last found its way to this town. It was recently given for the first time and created a sensation. The performance was excellent.

Brussels.—On the 11th ult. Herr Siegfried Wagner conducted a grand Orchestral Concert at the Alhambra Theatre. The programme consisted of works by his father, his grandfather, Liszt, and his teacher, Humperdinck. There was an enormous audience, who displayed extraordinary enthusiasm. That excellent Wagner connoisseur, Maurice Kufferath, compares, in the Guide Musical, Herr Wagner's rendering of several of the pieces to those lately heard under Mottl and Levi, to the advantage of the young and "inexperienced" conductor.

Cologne.—Verdi's "Falstaff" was given for the first time here at the Town Theatre, on February 18. The performance of this work was excellent and its reception enthusiastic.

Copenhagen.—The Danish Folkething has rejected the Government proposal to join the Berne Copyright Convention. The arguments against the bill were of the usual kind. To join the convention would mean a material loss to Danish theatre directors, publishers, &c., and difficulties would be put in the way of introducing and popularising the best foreign works. Therefore the Danes will continue to pirate, whenever there appears a new work worth pirating. We wonder what they would say if other nations retaliated, by appropriating their butter and cheese!

Florence.—On the 7th ult. Berlioz's "Faust" was given for the first time here. The brilliant work was most enthusiastically received and several numbers were encored.

Genoa.—"Theora," a new-three act opera by Edoardo Trucco, was given on February 14 for the first time, at the Carlo Felice Theatre, and was moderately successful.

Graz.—Wagner's "Tristan" has recently been added to the répertoire of the Town Theatre here. It was performed for the first time on February 13, and without cuts.

Guben.—Beethoven's colossal Choral Symphony was recently given here with such great success that it had to be repeated within a few days. The achievement speaks well for the enthusiasm of the musical amateurs of this little town and the energetic conductor, Herr Traugott Ochs.

Halle.—"Zamora," a new one-act opera, written and composed by Adolf Stierlin, was produced at the Town Theatre, on February 11, with considerable success.

Leipzig.—At a recent Orchestral Concert conducted by Professor Kretzschmar, the Adagio and Scherzo from Mr. F. H. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony were performed. The Scherzo was redemanded and repeated.—The Illustrirte Zeitung published recently a hitherto unknown portrait of Beethoven. It represents the great master in his 33rd or 34th year, and used to be the property of the Brunswick family, to a member of which, the Countess Theresa, his "Unsterbliche Geliebte," Beethoven was secretly engaged.

Lisbon.—Verdi's "Falstaff" was brilliantly successful when it was recently produced here with Maurel in the title rôle. He had to repeat one song five times, and for variety's sake he sang it in Italian, French, and Portuguese!

Madrid.—Wagner's "Meistersinger," or "Los maestros Cantores de Nuremberg," as it is called in Spanish, was performed for the first time in Spain, on the 3rd ult., at the Royal Theatre, Madrid. The first two acts were received coldly, but the third met with enthusiastic applause.

Metz.—A new Music-Drama entitled "Sigurd," written and composed by Heinrich Grimm, was recently produced at the Town Theatre. Its reception was, on the whole, favourable.

Milan.—Giacomo Puccini's opera "Manon Lescaut" met with much favour on its first performance at La Scala, on February 7.——Verdi has the intention of founding a large asylum for actors, singers, and musicians, and will devote the greater portion of his fortune to this noble object. "When my name is forgotten," he is reported to have said, "this asylum shall recall it." According to Italian papers, the veteran master expressed a wish to hear Wagner's "Walküre" at the Scala Theatre. After the performance he was asked what impression the work made on him, and he replied: "A crushing one; one has such a dislike to being convinced how small one is!"——A disgraceful scene occurred at La Scala on the 8th ult. The eighteenth performance of "Die Walküre" was to be given, but when the conductor, Mascheroni, appeared at his desk, a number of persons in the audience commenced to whistle, and shout "Enough, enough!" while others replied with "Go on!" The orchestra began the Prelude, but in vain; a second start was made only to provoke still more angry protests. After some delay the police ordered the performance to be stopped and the money to be refunded to the audience, which was done. There can hardly be any doubt that this protest against Wagner's opera is the work of an intriguing minority, though who are the instigators can only be conjectured. That the work was a success the number of performances clearly proves. The directors would hardly continue to put it in the bill if it did not draw paying audiences.

Monte Carlo.—A series of so called International Concerts is being given this winter on Sundays by M. Arthur Steck's band. On February 25 the programme was selected from the works of British composers—at any rate, they were announced as "œuvres anglaises"—and included the names of Balfe, Mackenzie, Oakeley, Sullivan ("Overture di Ballo"), Parish Alvars, Godfrey (!), and one Delius, whoever he may be. Sir Herbert Oakeley's Suite, with its brilliant rondo finale, was fairly played and well received, the composer himself being present, on his way back from Rome. It seems a pity that the authorities did not call to their councils someone with a competent knowledge of the resources of the English school, and thus save themselves from such inadequate expositions of what the foremost British musicians have been doing during the last fifty years.——A posthumous opera by the late highly gifted composer, César Franck, and entitled "Hulda," was produced on the 4th ult., at the Casino Theatre here, with great success. The plot is founded on a novel by Björnson.

Moscow.—A new String Quartet by A. Arensky, which was successfully produced here at a recent concert of the Russian Musical Society, presents a somewhat unusual feature. It is written for violin, viola, and two violoncellos, instead of the ordinary classical combination of stringed instruments.

Munich.—Verdi's "Falstaff," with Eugen Gura as the fat Knight, was very warmly received on its first performance here, at the Court Theatre, on the 2nd ult. The second act especially pleased immensely.

Naples.—Mascagni's "I Rantzau" achieved only a bare succès d'estime on its first performance here at the Mercadante Theatre, and this in spite of a capital interpretation. Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," on the other hand, is an emphatic success and continues to attract enthusiastic audiences at the San Carlo Theatre.——At the Mercadante Theatre the new opera "Regina Diaz," by Signor Giordano, the author of "Mala Vita," was only partly successful on its recent production. The composer was "called" only fifteen times, an insignificant number in Italy.

Nuremberg.—Signor Leoncavallo's "I Medici" was, on February 28, given here for the first time at the Town Theatre. The work was received with much applause.

Paris.—Gluck is likely to become the fashion here for a time, for his "Alceste" is to be given at the Théâtre Moderne; his "Armide" is in preparation at the Grand Opéra, and "Orféo" at the Opéra Comique.——On the 18th ult. Herr Felix Mottl, of Carlsruhe and Bayreuth, conducted the first of four "special" Orchestral Concerts at the Châtelet. The programme consisted of works by Berlioz and Wagner. The remaining three will be conducted by Hermann Levi, Edvard Grieg, and M. Colonne.—— Massenet's "Thaïs," a comédie lyrique in three acts and seven tableaux, the libretto by Louis Gallet, after the novel of Anatole France, was produced at the Grand Opéra, on the 16th ult., but somewhat coolly received. Mdlle. Sybil Sanderson was superb as the heroine. At the Colonne Concerts Berlioz's "Requiem" has been twice performed, while at the Concerts d'Harcourt, Beethoven's "Fidelio" has been given several times in its entirety.

Riga.—Rubinstein's sacred opera "Moses" was, on February 20, produced at the Town Theatre, under the direction of Capellmeister Wilhelm Bergner. The musical forces under his command consisted of a large chorus, powerful orchestra, as well as four grand pianofortes and a harmonium, and yet the good people of Riga failed to display any spontaneous enthusiasm!

Rouen.—Anton Rubinstein's opera "Nero" was, on February 14, given for the first time in France, at the Théâtre des Arts, and seems to have been very cordially received. The composer was present at the performance, and after the third act appeared before the curtain in response to enthusiastic applause, together with the librettist, Jules Barbier, who embraced him coram publico. This was the first performance of any opera of Rubinstein's in France.

Stuttgart.—Anton Rubinstein's opera "Die Maccabäer" met with much success on its first performance here on February 20, at the Court Theatre.——At the seventh Subscription Concert of the Court Orchestra a new "Spring" Symphony in C, by J. J. Abert, was played for the first time in public and achieved a great success.

Toulouse. — Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was recently performed here for the first time at the Théâtre du Capitole, and favourably received.

Turin.—On February 27 a new opera by a new composer, Gaetano Luporini, was produced at the Teatro Reggio, without however meeting with much success. Its title is "Dispetti amorosi," and it is the young musician's first attempt.

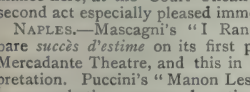
Vienna.—A special Concert recently given by the Hellmesberger Quartet was exclusively devoted to novelties. Amongst them were a String Quartet in A minor and a Pianoforte Quartet in B flat, both by Adolph Barjanski, and a String Quartet, also in A minor, by a new Bohemian composer, Carl Kovazovic. The last-named work was received with exceptional favour.——The two hundredth performance of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" at the Court Opera was given on February 25.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ART OF CHANTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—If your correspondent, "A Cathedralist," will kindly read the passage he refers to, as at p. 35 of my book, in connection with its context, he will see that the whole paragraph refers only to what can or cannot be done with Ouseley and Monk's pointing, and that I nowhere contemplate being constrained, by any good system of pointing, to leave without dissection such dissyllabic endings as "cymbals," or "gladness." The 1,376 trochaic verses remain, therefore, without any deductions. The word "cymbals" occurs at the end of the mediation and again at the end of the cadence in a verse of the 150th Psalm. Your reviewer says that I am unable to account for what he considers an inconsistency of treatment of this verse in Baker and Monk's Psalter. The reason I did not refer to his remark on the subject was that the clue to the answer was already given on pages 20 and 21 of my book. If I do not reply now, however, it will simply be because you do not permit me the space. Assuming that you grant it me, and thanking you for your courtesy in the matter, I will at once give the reply. The old chant form  becomes in practice by an old chanting rule  in order to round off the chant and give an effect of finality and repose. The final semibreve of the mediation of the pure Anglican chant represents the last two minims of the older form, written now as one note, because they usually, but not invariably, have the same sound: thus, the pointing below is consistent, unless the theory is incorrect, which has to be proved.



It gives me much pleasure to learn that we are soon to welcome a publication dealing with the strophical construction of the Psalms and the assignment of appropriate chants to their structural divisions. In my own limited sphere I have worked on this plan, so far as accompaniments extend, for the past twenty-two years, and, as opportunities offered themselves, with regard to chants also; while, at one time, I had some thought of publishing my notes on the subject.—Yours faithfully,

John Heywood.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In reply to Mr. Baker may I say that to modify strong accents and strengthen weak ones is altogether a different matter from maintaining the indefensible theory that in an Anglican Chant the antepenultimate is the natural place of the musical accent. There is scarcely an ordinary secular melody in which the treatment of the musical accent has not to be considered, and sometimes modified or strengthened, when words are set to it; and in a former letter I have ventured to insist, with Mr. Baker, on the necessity for similar treatment in the case of the Psalter. The instances Mr. Baker quotes are precisely in point,

thý | — sal- | -va- | -tion,
thróugh | my | foolish- | -ness, and others I could cite, being simply the most obvious way of "making the best of a bad job," and any musician, while admitting that the strong accent cannot but fall on the final syllable, would do his utmost to lighten its inevitable stress.

But, in the name of common-sense, if such compromise is forced upon one here and there, perhaps a score of times in the Psalter, why is the defect to be reproduced everywhere? It is "the fox without a tail" over again.

As to the accent-mark, one may not be able to count up all the possible misapprehensions and aberrations as to its meaning and proper observance; but a choirmaster who understands his business ought to be able to instruct his choir how to deal with it.

I do not fail to notice Mr. Baker's rule of making the note after the recitation the rallying-point for the choir. A rallying-point implies previous confusion, I presume during the course of the recitation. The experiments I have witnessed do not reassure me as to the effect of the application of the rule, in view of the good and even chanting at which we all aim.

There seems to be a standing objection, in the so-called "Church" school of pointing, to the use of anything like a bar at the end of the recitation (or anywhere else, for that matter). But Mr. Baker actually contemplates the application of the bar throughout the chant, recitation and all. These are his words: "Sing the first verse of Psalm 1 to a single chant, and instead of seven bars you will take about twelve." I have been taught that in chanting there are two elements, free recitation and strict rhythm, to be reckoned with, and reconciled as one best can. I think some of us will have to go to school again.—I am, your obedient Servant,

A Cathedralist.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—Perhaps you will kindly allow me a short space in your valuable paper to say a few words on the above deeply interesting subject. I wish to speak more particularly about the accent mark, and I fully endorse the excellent remarks of Mr. Baker when he says: "It is misleading, because the average choir attaches a fictitious importance to it." Do what you will, the choir will regard the syllable or word bearing the accent as a convenient place to make a pause; when there is only one word in the rhythmic bar this is right, but how is the choir to decide as they sing how those bars which contain three, four, or five syllables after the accent are to be divided so as to obtain uniformity? I am afraid, under the present system, this is impossible, because it would be difficult to find two choirmen who would exactly agree about the note value of such bars. As a matter of fact, choirmen get over such bars in this way—they make a pause on the accented syllable, and smuggle in the rest of the words as best they can, often in the most ludicrous fashion. I have often heard the first syllable of "cattle" and "bullock" dwelt upon, and if space permitted I could give quite a number of similar examples. Not long ago I asked a choir of about thirty singers if they could tell me the meaning of the accent; they all said it meant a pause was to be made on the word; and I further asked if any of them had read the preface to the "Cathedral Psalter," and I found that not one of them had done so. I should like to know the experience of other choirmasters on this subject. I am convinced we shall never have good chanting until we have placed over the words of the rhythmic bars notes clearly showing the time value of each syllable. I have tried this plan in my choir with the happiest results.—I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

Spes.

NOMENCLATURE OF INTERVALS.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—Will you permit an old subscriber and occasional correspondent to say a few words on the above subject, which, as you justly remark, is a source of vexation both to teacher and pupil?

The existing confusion has of late been aggravated by the new-fangled plan of counting intervals from the key-note only. One result has been to give the name of Major (i.e., greater) to the smaller of the two fourths contained in the diatonic scale.

The return to the old nomenclature now advocated by the School Music Review seems, on the whole, desirable; and as regards seconds, thirds, sixths, and sevenths, no objection need be made. But for the two species of fifths I should prefer to retain the names Perfect and Imperfect, because (having no definite meaning) they render needless any discussion as to the nature of those intervals; similarly (as expressing an indisputable fact and avoiding discussion), "Tritone" seems preferable to "Augmented Fourth."

Looking at the matter from a logical point of view, many desirable reforms might doubtless be suggested in our musical nomenclature generally. But, in music as in orthography, we all know the fate of radical reformers, and should take warning accordingly. It is both hopeless and undesirable to interfere with defects that have been universally accepted. Still, there can be no harm in trying to explain how they have arisen.

For example, it may be asked why, seeing that twice two are four, two seconds should not make a fourth? The reason is obvious enough, and the anomaly is not confined to music. A Frenchman will habitually speak of a week as eight and of a fortnight as fifteen days, though he knows as well as we do that the week and fortnight contain seven and fourteen days respectively.

With regard to musical intervals, common arithmetic may be applied to them without difficulty, provided we remember (1) to subtract unity from the received name of the interval, and (2) to add unity to the result, in order to conform to established usage. Thus, two superposed fifths will make a ninth, because $2 \times 4 = 8$; and two octaves make a fifteenth, because $2 \times 7 = 14$.

Retaining, as we must do, our defective nomenclature, we might at least use it so as to avoid ambiguities. But how often do we find in our manuals of harmony (and still more of counterpoint) directions to "double the fifth," the meaning intended being that we are to double the note which makes a fifth with the bass. An actual doubled fifth would of course be a ninth. There have even been discussions as to whether the octave contains twelve or thirteen semitones, discussions of which a little consistency of definition would have shown the absurdity.—I am, &c.,

C. W.

P.S.—Another objection may be pointed out to the use of the term "Augmented Fourth"—namely, the practical existence of an Augmented Tritone. It arises thus:

We all know that the Chord of the "German Sixth" is usually (for special reasons) followed by the Dominant Fourth. Now when this occurs in a major key, Schumann (and others) prefer to write a sharpened fourth rather than the perfect fifth usually employed. And this sharpened fourth is the Augmented Tritone, an interval hitherto unrecognised in our text-books.

PIANOFORTE v. ORGAN TOUCH.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—May I point out a matter herein which has escaped observation?

It is taken for granted that modern appliances for lightening organ touch have removed an objectionable feature by rendering pressure of the key all that is necessary to produce the tone. So far as pneumatic and electro-pneumatic actions are concerned, the fall of the key does all that can be done and the pallet "flops" down with more or less speed.

In good trackerwork, however, there is, on the contrary, on the unanimous testimony of many eminent organists, a subtle but very real touch. The finger feels and poises the pallet, opening it as another is relinquished in a manner impracticable through any mechanical intermediary. There thus obtains a beauty of phrasing and delicacy of touch which seems to me to be of great educational advantage with reference to the pianoforte. Schumann's advice to pianoforte students to practise the organ must, I take it, have been based upon trackerwork organs, for the most part of by no means light touch.

For high-pressure reeds, &c., the percussive wind-stroke produced by pneumatics may be useful, and pneumatics must be resorted to for large organs. There is, however, no necessity for large organs as a rule. One of two dozen stops for Great, Swell, and Pedal may be of sufficient power for a church holding 2,000 people, especially if supplemented by a solo clavier with pneumatic action, yet may have an elastic, phrasing tracker-touch.

Is it not then worthy of consideration whether the unnecessary resort to pneumatics or electro-pneumatics does not involve a serious and uncompensated musical loss?

Thomas Casson.

"THE MESSIAH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Perhaps some of your correspondents would do us a kindness in this part of the world, by informing us of the correctness of several editions of the above Oratorio, which are in use in our church choir (All Saints', St. Kilda).

1. In bar 7 of the Introduction should G in the bass be read G sharp?

2. In the first chorus, "And the glory," should bars 5 and 6 from the end each contain a dotted minim, or one dotted minim be tied to a minim in the next bar with a crotchet rest after it, as in the accompaniment?

Our choirmaster is a very particular gentleman, and jealous of notes and rests receiving their proper value. He is under the impression that Best's edition must be correct.

If Handel wrote two dotted minims tied for the soprano and alto parts only, and made the other voices and the accompaniments cease one beat before them, had he a motive for so doing? and if so, what was that motive?

In the score before me I find a certificate, signed by six musicians, that it is correct according to Handel's score, and, therefore, I presume Mr. Best can account for his edition being somewhat at variance in the parts under question.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

J. Summers.

5, Luzmore Terrace, St. Kilda Road,
Melbourne, Australia.

[In the fac-simile edition of Handel's full score the notes appear exactly as they do in Mr. Best's edition. Handel undoubtedly wrote G sharp in bar 7 of the Introduction, and placed a crotchet rest on the third beat of the fifth bar from the end of "And the glory," in the soprano and alto parts.—Ed. M. T.]

The grandson of Carl Maria von Weber, who is writing a history of "Der Freischütz," has calculated that up to the present no less than 6,700 performances of this delightful work have been given in Berlin alone. And yet it doesn't contain an Intermezzo! Writing about "Der Freischütz," we may mention that at Lübeck it has lately been twice performed with the introductory scene between Agatha and the Hermit which Weber, after very careful consideration, eliminated from the libretto. A certain Herr Oscar Möricke has had the impertinence (there is no other word for it) to set this scene to music, and to have it played, at the aforesaid performances, before the Overture. Such a piece of vandalism might have been expected from an artist (save the mark!) who some years ago published a plan for performing the whole of Wagner's "Nibelung's Ring" in one evening. We need hardly add that his precious plan consisted of an extra liberal application of the blue pencil. Such a course, or something similar, was also advocated by a musical critic of a certain London weekly. But that was about ten years ago; no doubt he knows better now.

Of the many Concerts given on Good Friday, one of the most artistic importance was that of "The Redemption," at the Queen's Hall, given under the conductorship of Mr. F. H. Cowen. The impressive choral music was intelligently and effectively sung by the Queen's Hall Choral Society, and the requirements of the solo parts were fully met by Miss Ella Russell, Miss Mabel Elliot, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Bispham, and Mr. Watkin Mills, the first-named artist having to repeat the beautiful number "From Thy love as a Father." An excellent orchestra was led by Mr. J. T. Carrodus, and Mr. H. D. Wetton presided with skill at the organ.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie has been elected a member of the Athenæum Club—not, however, in the ordinary way, by Ballot, but by the Committee, under the provisions of a rule that permits the election every year of a limited number of persons of "distinguished eminence."

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Bangor.—Holy Week at Bangor Cathedral was marked by the performance of three Oratorios—Spohr's "Last Judgment," Stainer's "Crucifixion," and Emlyn Evans's Welsh work "Gweddi 'r Cristion." There was also a special Lenten Service of trios, duets, sacred solos, and the "Miserere" by the choristers, held in the Nave, with pianoforte accompaniment. All the music for the week was given under the direction of the Cathedral Organist, Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan. On the 28th ult. Lowry's Service of Song, "The Resurrection," was to be sung in the Cathedral by an augmented choir.

Bedford.—The Musical Society gave the first Concert of its twenty-eighth season in the Corn Exchange, on the 6th ult., when the chief works performed were Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, and Spohr's "As pants the hart." The solos were effectively sung by Miss Emily Davies, Miss Mary Reeve, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Dan Price, and the choruses rendered in a manner that reflected much credit on all concerned. Miss M. Chetham led an efficient orchestra, and Mr. P. H. Diemer conducted.

Bradford.—The Permanent Orchestra gave the last Concert of this season on the 10th ult., when much interest was evinced in the production of an orchestral ballad in A minor, entitled "The Wreck of the Hesperus," by Dr. C. Vincent. The work was excellently played under the direction of the composer, and was warmly received. The programme also included Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, with Mr. Frederick Dawson as soloist, and songs which were pleasingly sung by Miss Marie Lummert. During the Concert Dr. Vincent was presented by Mr. J. Gatecliffe, on behalf of the orchestra, with a silver cigarette case.

Cambridge.—The Musical Union in connection with the Church of England Young Men's Society gave, on the 13th ult., an effective performance of Haydn's "Creation," in the Guildhall. The chorus and orchestra, the latter led by Mr. R. H. Ingram, numbered about 120 executants, and the soloists were Miss Florence Monk, Mr. Walter Driver, and Mr. Herbert Hilton. Mr. P. Pain rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte, Mr. F. Bowman presided at the organ, and Mr. W. T. See conducted.

Chichester.—Mr. Seymour Kelly's annual Lenten Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on the 14th ult., when the first part of the programme consisted of selections from "The Messiah," the solos in which were sung by Miss Masie Riversdale, Miss Dora Barnard, Mr. S. Brown, and Mr. S. Kelly, and the choruses effectively rendered under the skilful conductorship of the Concert-giver. In the second part a "Melodie Religieuse" was effectively played by Mr. A. G. Whitehead (violin), Miss M. Calvert (violoncello), Mr. P. Whitehead (harmonium), and Mrs. Dean (pianoforte).

Coupar Angus, N.B.—The Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Bennett's "May Queen" on February 24, under the conductorship of Mr. F. S. Graves. The principals were Miss Wills, Miss L. Forbes, Mr. W. Douglas, and Mr. Young, of whom Miss Wills was especially successful.

Darlington.—The fourteenth annual Concert of the Orchestral Society took place on the 16th ult., in the Central Hall. Included in the programme were Beethoven's first Symphony and Rubinstein's Quartet (No. 3, Op. 17), played by Mr. Beer's party from Newcastle. The vocalist was Miss Dews. The Concert was in every way a great success, and was conducted, as usual, by Mr. Fred. Tovey.

Enniscorthy, Ireland.—St. Patrick's night was celebrated in the Cathedral by a special musical service, which included Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and selections from the "Redemption" and other well-known oratorios. The celebration was largely attended by people from all parts of the county. The soloists were Mesdames E. Cody, L. and M. Courtney, C. Donohoe, Fitzgerald, Halley, Hammond, A. Kehoe, Kelly, K. Lacy, and M. Murphy; and Messrs. M. Furlong, Hammond, Kelly, M. Kirwan, T. Moore, J. O'Brien, J. O'Toole, and N. Walshe. Great credit is due to Mr. A. Fitzgerald, the Cathedral Organist, for the praiseworthy manner in which the music was rendered.

Falkirk.—A successful Concert was given on February 22, in the Town Hall, by Mr. T. W. Blakey, who conducted an admirable performance of Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden," for which an excellent solo quartet was provided, consisting of Miss Rosina Isidor, Miss C. Curnow, Mr. Phillip Newbury, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike. The interest of the evening was greatly increased by the pianoforte playing of Mr. Max Pauer and the violoncello solos of Signor Ronchini. The accompanists were Mr. F. F. Watkis and Mr. D. McIntyre.

Gravesend. — Almost every available seat in the St. James's Church was occupied on the 14th ult., when the cantata "Gethsemane," by C. L. Williams, was performed. The usual choir had been considerably augmented, but more attention might possibly have been paid to the balance of voices. Beyond this defect there was little that called for adverse criticism in the singing of the choruses. The solo vocalists were Miss Nellie Smith, Miss Alice Hendry, Mr. W. Faulkner, and Mr. Fred. Noakes. The organ was under the care of Mr. C. Burrows Moss, who played the introduction and the incidental music with marked ability.

Hayes, Kent.—On the 14th ult. an Oratorio Service, accompanied by full orchestra and organ, was held in the Parish Church for the first time, and, judging by the attention with which the congregation listened to the reverent and expressive rendering of Gounod's "Redemption" (Part I.), it should not be the last. Credit is due to Mr. Hugh Burry, Organist of the Church, who conducted, for securing a performance of the beautiful music far above the average of church orchestral services. The orchestra (with but few exceptions) was professional and Mr. Avalon Collard had been engaged for the important part of the Narrator (tenor). The Service opened with Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, and during the Offertory an orchestral composition by Mr. G. C. Burry (the Organist of the occasion) was played.

Henley-on-Thames. — On the 21st ult. a successful rendering of Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given by the choir in Holy Trinity Church. The solos were admirably sung by Mr. Harry Stubbs and the Rev. P. Tuckwell, and Mr. J. Herbert Chalmers, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, presided at the organ.

Hull.—Under the auspices of the Literary and Philosophical Society, the Misses Edith, Ada, Beryl, and Dora Tulloch gave, on February 20, in the Royal Institution, one of their artistic and interesting Musical and Dramatic Recitals, which attracted a large audience.

Huntley.—On the 16th ult. the new organ, recently erected by Mr. Eustace Ingram in the Parish Church, was opened by Dr. A. L. Peace.

Jarrow-on-Tyne.—On the 7th ult. the Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. J. M. Preston, gave its second Invitation Concert. Hiller's "Song of Victory" and Handel's "Zadok the Priest" were well sung by the chorus and orchestra of about 200 executants, and the programme also included Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Hérold's "Zampa" Overtures. The soloists were Miss Ada Lee and Mr. Morgan Wilkinson, whose singing was greatly appreciated. Mr. L. A. Abram was leader of the orchestra, and Miss Theresa Larkin played the pianoforte accompaniments.

Kington.—On the 15th ult. two Organ Recitals were given in the Parish Church, by Dr. J. Warriner, Organist of St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill, London. On each occasion there was a large congregation, and the interesting and varied programme, diversified by vocal music from Mr. Banks, of Hereford Cathedral, and the church choir, was much appreciated.

Kingston-on-Thames.—Haydn's "Passion" Music was sung in the Parish Church, by the Choral Society, on the 1st ult., before a large congregation. The soloists were Miss Purvis, Miss Lunn, Mr. Green, and Mr. Archdeacon, all of the Royal College of Music. Mr. Edwin Stephenson presided at the organ and Mr. A. P. Alderson (Organist of the Church) conducted.——Mr. Henry Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was effectively performed on the 12th ult., in the St. James's Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. G. H. Norris. The soloists were Miss A. Gridley, Miss L. Weaver, Mr. S. Masters, and Mr. R. A. Scase. Mrs. Marlow was the pianist and Mr. W. C. Webb the organist.

Leamington.—On the 1st ult. the Philharmonic and St. Paul's Choral Union gave an admirable performance of Handel's "Samson," under the conductorship of Mr. George Kennett (Mr. Albert Gibbs, the Conductor of the Union, being ill). The soloists were Miss Teresa Blamy, Miss Minnie Hackett, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, and Mr. George Stubbs.——On the 8th ult., at St. Mark's Church, a service of Lenten Music was given by the choir, conducted by the Rev. W. Wale, with Mr. George Kennett (the Organist) at the organ. The selection included Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm and unfinished Oratorio "Christus"; Bargiel's three-part Motet for equal voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd," sung by the boys of the choir; Air, "Sing ye praise," sung by Mr. E. Bloomfield, of the Parish Church choir; and Mozart's Motet for bass voice and chorus, "Ne pulvis et cinis."

Leytonstone. — The Choral Society concluded its twelfth season on the 5th ult., when the programme included selections from Mozart's Seventh Mass and part-songs and madrigals by eminent composers. Miss Ada Semmens, Mr. Thomas Kempton, and Mr. Whinney were the soloists, and Mr. J. W. Ullyett conducted with his usual skill.

Lutterworth.—On the 9th ult. the Musical Society conducted by Mr. W. Adkins gave an excellent performance of Handel's "Jephtha." The principals were Mrs. A. James, Mrs. W. H. Blunt, Miss F. Adcock, Mr. R. B. Babbington, and Mr. J. Smith; and the instrumental portion of the work was ably played by a small orchestra under the leadership of Mr. W. Bird.

Morpeth.—For many years it has been the custom to sing Stainer's "Crucifixion" in St. James's Church on Palm Sunday. This year that work has been changed for Gaul's "Passion," which was given on the 18th ult., under the direction of the Choirmaster, Mr. Nichol Wright. The work produced a very favourable impression. The baritone solos were sung by Mr. Nichol Wright. The chorus parts were well sustained, and "O consider this" was excellently rendered. The accompaniment was played on the organ by Mr. J. Brewis. Much satisfaction was given by this new departure, and the performance was repeated at evensong on Wednesday in Holy Week.

Newcastle. — The second Invitation Concert this season of the Gateshead Choral Society took place in the Town Hall on the 13th ult., when the programme included

Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and Hecht's "Charge of the Light Brigade," in all of which the choir fully sustained its reputation. Great success was also achieved by Madame Bertha Moore, who was the solo vocalist, and by the orchestra, led by Mr. J. H. Beers, in the first performance here of Mr. C. F. Lloyd's Concert-Overture in F. Mr. Thomas Wilkinson presided at the organ and Mr. J. M. Preston conducted with his usual skill.——On the 14th ult. Mr. Henschel's new Scottish Orchestra made a most successful début here in the Olympia Hall. The Concert included fine renderings of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor and the "Oberon" and "Tannhäuser" Overtures, Mr. M. Sons was heard in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Mrs. Henschel was the vocalist.——Mr. George Dodds has accepted the conductorship of the Clayton Orchestral Society.

Reading.—Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt gave an exhaustive and able Lecture, on the 5th ult., in the Town Hall, on "The History of Oratorio." Mr. Tirbutt traced in a lucid and interesting manner the development of oratorio from the mysteries, moralities, and miracle plays of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and an admirable selection of vocal excerpts from some of the works referred to was effectively sung by Madame Isabel George, Miss Maude Gillett, Mr. C. A. Starkey, and Mr. W. G. House. The Lecture, which is one of a series in connection with the University Extension College, attracted a large audience.

Richmond.—One of the largest audiences which have assembled this session at the Athenæum was attracted on February 28, when Miss Edith Nott Bower lectured upon the lyric music of Shakespeare's "Tempest." Miss Bower gave a graphic description of the limited instrumental means at the command of composers in the seventeenth century, and commented in an instructive manner upon the settings of the various songs in the "Tempest" by Robert Johnson, Purcell, Arne, Christopher Smith, Thomas Lindley, and T. Cooke. Musical illustrations, in which the lecturer took part, were admirably sung by Miss Neile Matthews, Miss Lilias Reddie, and Messrs. Webb, Chapman, and Sumpter. Mrs. Bordier acted as accompanist.

Rochdale.—One of the best Concerts recently given here took place in the Town Hall on the 17th ult., when the vocalists were Miss Kate Shields, Mrs. Dews, Mr. Riley Walker, and Mr. W. Sweetman. Mr. J. Howarth contributed violin solos and Mr. C. G. Lewis acted as accompanist.

Romford.—Stainer's cantata "The Crucifixion" was repeated in the Parish Church, on the 15th ult., before a large congregation. Messrs. Herbert Clinch (tenor) and J. W. Freeman (bass) sang the solos in a very effective manner.

Runcorn.—In the presence of a large and appreciative audience the Tonic Sol-fa Choir concluded its ninth season, in the Public Hall, on February 28, by an excellent performance of Handel's "Jephtha." The principal vocalists were Miss Ada Lee, Miss Ravell, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. A. S. Kinnell. Mr. F. Royle was Organist, Mr. J. W. Collinson, leader of the band, and Mr. John Holford, Conductor.

Scarborough.—A large congregation assembled in All Saints' Church on the 2nd ult., when Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given by the Choral Union, assisted by members of the church choir, under the conductorship of Mr. A. M. Richardson. The solos were effectively sung by Miss Emily Pattison, Miss Jennie Bentley, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Hanson. A small orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cass, ably assisted Mr. F. Bentley, who presided at the organ.

South Shields.—The Choral Society, assisted by Madame Bertha Moore, Mrs. Vinecombe, and Mr. Hirwen Jones, gave, on the 14th ult., in the Assembly Hall, an admirable performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." An orchestra of about forty performers was led by Mr. J. H. Beers, and Mr. Fairs conducted. The second part of the programme included Auber's Overture to "Masaniello," and an excellent selection of songs, the pianoforte accompaniments to which were effectively played by Miss A. Smith.

Stranraer.—The Choral Union gave, on February 23, a Choral and Orchestral Concert in the New Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. J. G. Pearson, Organist of the Parish Church. A feature of the Concert was the first appearance of the Society's string orchestra, which in addition to accompanying the chorus, rendered very creditably Handel's "Samson," Hérold's "Zampa," and Foster's "Rob Roy" Overtures. The chorus was equally successful in Pattison's cantatas "The New Jerusalem" and "May Day." Some good songs were well sung, and on the whole the Concert was the best yet given by the Society. The principal vocalists were the Misses Easton, Wither, Marchbanks, Young, Southerland, M. Horner, and Holding; and Messrs. May, O'Keefe, Weir, Douglas, Smith, and Baird.

Taunton.—The Taunton Madrigal Society gave its annual Ladies' Night on Shrove Tuesday, when the Assembly Room was filled by an appreciative audience. The part-music was most artistically rendered, two pieces being redemanded, and Miss Cheetham's and Mr. Douglas Powell's solos greatly enjoyed. The President of the Society, F. H. Cheetham, Esq., J.P., assisted at the pianoforte, and Dr. Albert Ham conducted, as usual.

Thrapston.—The Nonconformist Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. N. Smith, jun., performed, on the 12th ult., in the Temperance Hall, Mr. George Shinn's new Oratorio "Lazarus of Bethany." The soloists were Mrs. Bye, Mrs. L. Hutchen, Mr. Edwin Smith, and Mr. F. C. Robinson; and the chorus and orchestra, the latter led by Mr. J. W. Randall, numbered sixty executants.

Trent.—On the 15th ult. Mr. George H. Fox gave his third public Organ Recital in Trent College. The programme was chiefly drawn from the compositions of the best French organ writers, and was effectively varied by violin solos by Mr. A. N. Peat.

Tunbridge Wells.—In connection with the Palm Sunday services at St. Augustine's Catholic Church, an impressive performance of Beethoven's Mass in C was given by the choir at the High Mass, the offertory piece being an arrangement by Mr. Formes of a Quartet of Spohr's. In the evening an effective rendering of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given, the solos, as in the Mass, being taken by Madame Lonsdale Barrett, Miss Florence Croft, Mr. J. G. Blanchard, Mr. Donovan, and Mr. Conrad Formes. Mendelssohn's Magnificat, Webbe's "Ave Regina," and Palestrina's "Pueri" were also sung incidentally during the services. Miss Elliott presided on each occasion most ably at the organ.

Wallington.—For its second Concert this season the executive of the Musical Association selected Sterndale Bennett's Oratorio "The Woman of Samaria," which received an admirable interpretation on the 15th ult., in the Parish Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. G. F. Bruce. Effective renderings of the solos were given by Miss Janie Bridges, Miss Violet Hoole, Mr. J. G. Langton, and Mr. E. Phillips. The first-named artist was subsequently the soloist in Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," which, together with several songs—one of which was sung by Mrs. J. A. Smith—and a violin solo played by Miss Mendham, formed the second half of the programme. Efficient assistance was rendered by a small orchestra, and Mr. E. W. Groocock presided at the pianoforte with great skill and artistic judgment.

West Bridgford.—The third Concert of the season by the Choral Society took place in the new Pavilion, Trent Bridge Ground, on the 8th ult., when the principal work performed was Bennett's "May Queen." The solos were effectively sung by Mrs. Pemberton, Miss Hancock, Mr. W. E. Bass, and Mr. F. Kirk, and the choruses sung in a manner which reflected great credit on Mr. J. S. Derbyshire, the Conductor of the Society. The accompaniments were ably played by Miss Pemberton on the pianoforte and Mr. W. Stevenson on an American organ.

Whitby.—On February 28 Mr. T. J. Hoggett gave an interesting and instructive Lecture on "Schumann," before the members and friends of the Congregational Literary and Musical Society. Numerous illustrations were admirably rendered by a company of artists, consisting of Miss E. M. Gray and Messrs. Beadnell, Beilby, Hallgate, and the lecturer. Captain W. Foster occupied the chair.

Wigan.—The second Concert given this season by the Wigan and District Choral Union took place in the Public Hall on the 7th ult., when Gaul's "Israel in the Wilderness" was performed by a chorus and orchestra of upwards of 150 executants. The chorus singing reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Charles D. Mortimer, and the solos were effectively sung by Miss Rose Long, Mr. I. T. Birch, and Mr. T. Horrex, all from Birmingham. During the interval, Mr. Taylor, on behalf of the members of the Union, presented Mr. C. D. Mortimer with a handsome gold chain and gold medal.

GABRIELLA. Lyric Drama in One Act. Composed expressly for and dedicated to Madame Adelina Patti. By Emilio Pizzi.

"It is many years since the musical public of this city has been given such a sensation as that caused by the first performance of Signor Pizzi's 'Gabriella,' at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon. . . . It is music that appeals to the heart and the sentiment of humanity, and yet has in it elements which gratify the higher intellectual faculties."—The Boston Sunday Herald, November 26, 1893.

OF THE

AT

WITH A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF GRADUATES IN THAT FACULTY FROM THE YEAR 1463

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

Extract from Preface.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

MUSICAL GESTURES

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC

BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE

MUS. DOC., OXON.

Organist and Master of the Choristers of Westminster Abbey; Gresham Professor of Music.

This system is already in use in many Schools and Choirs.

Dr. Sweeting, Music Master of Rossall School, writes: "The result is admirable. The 'Gestures' and also the rudiments in rhyme will, I am sure, lighten the dry part of many a Music Master's work."

Mr. Hanforth, Mus.B., Organist of Sheffield Parish Church, says: "It is a capital system. I have given my boys one good dose already—a class of about thirty. From the avidity with which it was swallowed I believe it will prove a popular medicine. This morning I found them busily conducting a class among themselves."

Dr. Sawyer speaks in high terms of the "Gestures," which he has introduced in his various Choirs and Classes.

Choirmasters, or Heads of Schools, can see the Westminster Boys at the "Gestures" on written application to Dr. Bridge.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS. In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

No little amusement was created last evening by the spectacle of a number of Dr. Bridge's choristers crossing the platform with measured tread while enunciating the notes of the scale in any key desired. All the "Gestures" were duly illustrated in this way, and their simplicity was thus effectually brought home to the minds of the audience. . . . Dr. Bridge's "Gestures" will facilitate the learning of the "rudiments" by young pupils.

STANDARD.

Dr. Bridge afterwards proceeded to put near a score of choristers from Westminster Abbey through musical gestures—twenty-three in all—and with their assistance he abundantly demonstrated his simple but effective method.

DAILY NEWS.

Professor Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, has just written for Novello's "Music Primers" an interesting account of how the Abbey choirboys are taught in class by means of "Musical Gestures." The shapes of notes and the rests are shown by various positions of the fingers and arms, the tones and semitones by steps and half steps, and so forth, there being twenty-three "Gestures," each illustrated by the picture of an Abbey boy in the act of performing it. At Westminster Abbey the juniors have long practised the rudiments by means of this ingenious device, and Professor Bridge enthusiastically declares the boys prefer the music game to cricket. He is now publishing the book mainly for use in the nursery, for school classes, and for country choirs.

MORNING POST.

With the aid of the Westminster Choristers, who were in attendance, Dr. Bridge ran through the whole set of lessons, and the proficiency of the boys and the ingenious and amusing gestures and rhymes employed occasioned hearty applause and laughter. The whole time occupied by the lecture and the practical exposition of the method was only just over an hour.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Judging from the illustrations, vocal and physical, shown by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, the invention should be of immense service to country choirmasters.

MORNING LEADER.

. . . Bids fair to win immortality in the grateful recollection of future generations of children. He has invented a new system of imparting the rudiments of music to children, a system which, in his own words, "combines physical training with musical training." . . . By Dr. Bridge's system—one of the very greatest ingenuity—you enlist a child's love of exercise and movement in aid of his musical studies.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Like most good inventions, its simplicity is its chief merit. It will save the instructors and pupils alike many a weary half-hour.

ECHO.

The ingenious manual devices by which these highly-trained lads represented the duration of notes and their position and the various written signs of music, beat time double, triple, and quadruple, sang and stepped the scales, and explained the meaning of the gestures, in their natural voices, and not in stupid monotone, were as novel as they were pleasing, and were evidently as much enjoyed by the boys as the spectators.

SUNDAY TIMES.

An expeditious method of learning the simpler rudiments of music by means of manual exercises. . . . Should be of much service in training country choirs.

FIGARO.

It is a very ingenious idea, and admirably suited for the nursery and also for training village church choirs and others.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The organist of Westminster Abbey has often something new to tell us, and as he is well provided with a set of chubby cherubs on whom experiments can be tried, we are not surprised at his putting forth a new means of teaching youngsters the signs in music. . . . At the end of the book are ten Vocal Exercises in rhyme, designed to impress upon beginners the rudiments of music. These are most cleverly constructed, and we advise choirmasters to get the book and make use of them.

YORKSHIRE POST.

Dr. Bridge's system may be described as a sort of musical drill, in which the scholars' gestures are ingeniously contrived to represent the various symbols used to express notes, clefs, rests, &c. In addition to this, some vocal exercises, entitled "Rudiments in Rhyme," are well calculated to "impress upon beginners the rudiments of music, while exercising at the same time their voices."

LEEDS MERCURY.

A portion of the Abbey Soprano Choir illustrated vocally the novel but simple scheme of Professor Bridge, and the proceedings, held in the City of London School, were followed with considerable interest by a crowded audience.

GLASGOW HERALD.

A most ingenious little book. . . . The book is largely made up of beautifully drawn diagrams and figures, which make the work of the teacher plain. . . . A better method than that here laid down of driving the elements into boys' heads could scarcely be imagined.

THE CATHEDRAL PARAGRAPH PSALTER

CONTAINING THE

CANTICLES, PSALMS, AND PROPER PSALMS

ARRANGED IN PARAGRAPHS AND POINTED FOR CHANTING

TOGETHER WITH

A SCHEME OF APPROPRIATE CHANTS AND BRIEF NOTES ON THE PSALTER

EDITED BY THE

REV. J. TROUTBECK, D.D.

(Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Minor Canon of Westminster).

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

The principle of Pointing followed is that of the Cathedral Psalter, with slight modifications here and there, suggested by experience, in the treatment of individual verses. For the accents which are used in the Cathedral Psalter to indicate the beginning of the bar of duple time, which connects the free recitation with the metrical part of the chant, are substituted super-imposed musical notes, in accordance with the principle set forth in the Preface to the Cathedral Psalter, so as to indicate exactly, in every verse throughout the Psalter, the best method of dividing the bar into the component parts of a semibreve. Other means also have been adopted to ensure clearness and promote facility.

Prefixed to the new Psalter is a Scheme of Chants and some brief Notes on the History of the Psalter and the Characteristics of each Psalm.

As nearly simultaneously as may be, will be published

A REVISED AND GREATLY ENLARGED EDITION OF

THE WESTMINSTER ABBEY CHANT BOOK

In the preparation of which Dr. Bridge has been associated with Dr. Troutbeck. This edition will contain a full set of Chants appropriate to the new Psalter—single, double, triple, and quadruple—many of them written for the collection by well-known composers.

ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

"Mr. Gaul's latest work is another proof of his practical wisdom as well as of his ability as a composer. We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra, with Mr. A. J. Eyre as organist. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work, 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"The part-writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout. There is sufficient variety to prevent any feeling of monotony. . . . At its close the composer was heartily cheered."—Daily News.

"Without being unduly difficult, it is indisputably effective."—London Figaro.

"At the close of the work, portions of which were loudly applauded, Mr. Gaul, who conducted, was warmly complimented on a Cantata which is likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City' and other of his compositions."—Daily Chronicle.

"Characterised by the same refinement as that of Mr. Gaul's extremely successful work 'The Holy City.'"—The Athenæum.

"We may say at once that the music is characterised by Mr. Gaul's usual felicity of treatment. Mr. Gaul had every reason to be gratified with the performance and reception of his Cantata, and he may expect to hear of many more performances."—Musical Times.

"Musicianly and excellent, and not too difficult to imperil its popularity."—Musical Opinion.

UNA

CANTATA

FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

VERSE BY

FREDERICK ENOCH

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PERFORMANCE IN THE PUBLIC HALL, IPSWICH, JANUARY 16, 1894.

"'Una' has been so recently described and criticised that there is no necessity for detailed reference to the composition. Roughly speaking, it is founded upon the story of 'Una and the Lion' as told in the 'Faërie Queene,' amplified in verse of unusual excellence by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and full of romantic incident which commends itself to picturesque musical expression. . . . possesses in a marked degree the great charms of tunefulness and vivacity. It is above all things an understandable Cantata—not one of those crabbed and crooked things which no ordinary person can understand. The most striking and romantic number is undoubtedly the chorus 'Hark! the Angelus is calling,' in which the campanels used at Norwich (manufactured by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) were introduced. It is free and comparatively simple in style, but full of poetic melody, recalling by a flash of association that famous and familiar picture of 'The Angelus.' This was admirably given, and the choruses throughout, indeed, 'went' with great spirit and precision, reflecting much credit upon those engaged, and upon Mr. Dalby's efforts as leader in preparing for the Concert. The swinging chorus, 'Let's hasten on,' was loudly encored. A similar compliment was paid to all four soloists for their best efforts—to Mr. Henry Piercy for the song, 'Shine, vestal star'; to Miss Croft for the taking solo, 'The enchanter's wand,' which should become a popular excerpt; to Miss Rose Long, who did full and sympathetic justice to the charming song, 'O love will love,' and to Mr. Daniel Price for his rendering of 'A Palmer, met upon my way.' At the close, the performance as a whole was loudly applauded by the well-pleased audience. The composer himself conducted, and was most heartily welcomed as he came to the front of the platform."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and suave part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction."—South-Western World.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Need it be said to those who know Dr. Mackenzie's "Pibroch" that this national music—for such, after all, it is—comes to us with the great advantage of individual distinction. As much may be said of everything from the same pen. The composer never drops into the common speech of his art. . . . Called twice to the platform when her task had ended, Lady Hallé returned on the second occasion with Dr. Mackenzie and presented him for applause which the audience were quite in the mood to bestow.

MORNING POST.

Although the themes upon which it is founded are original, there is no mistaking the strong Scottish flavour that pervades them. What Grieg is to Norway, and Dvorák to Bohemia, Mackenzie is to Scotland. The rhythmic peculiarities of his native music have become so fixedly located in his mind that he reproduces them spontaneously in his works. It cannot be said of him that he imitates the characteristics of Scotch music, for he has made these his own. Those who are familiar with his "Pibroch" will doubtless realise what we mean. It is when he is thoroughly himself—that is, when he expresses himself in his own native musical dialect—that Mackenzie appeals to us most.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

A beautiful, poetical, eminently characteristic piece, while laudably free from what are vulgarly supposed to be the genuine characteristics of Scotch music.

THE GLOBE.

The Scottish composer's "Highland Ballad," from Op. 47, finely played by Lady Hallé, is a piece more remarkable for absolute beauty than for national or local colouring; it makes its effect none the less well on account of this, though it requires a finished artist to do it justice.

LISZT'S BIOGRAPHY.

Miss L. Ramann has already received the hearty congratulations of The Musical Times on the completion of her Life of Liszt,* the first volume of which, treating of the period 1811-40, was issued in 1880. Part 1 of Vol. II. (1841-47) followed in 1887, and the concluding portion (1848-86) bears the date of the present year. Sketches and reminiscences of Liszt, in various languages, have been issued in profusion, but here we are put into possession of the solitary example of a book which treats of the master's life and works from the day of his birth to that of his death. For comprehensiveness and completeness, if not also for its reliability as to the facts advanced, it stands without a rival. As a personal friend of many years' standing, and as a devoted admirer of Liszt, Miss Ramann had opportunities of gaining information at first hand which were denied to others, and these she has undoubtedly turned to good account. It seems well to recall that some years ago, when the late Dr. Hueffer was editing a series of short biographies of "Great Musicians," the present writer asked him: "Will you not include one of Liszt?" He replied, "No! that would require an immense amount of research among foreign newspapers, &c. Miss Ramann has gone over the whole ground, and it would be waste of time for anyone else to go over it again. We must wait for her forthcoming book."

Now we have got it in its entirety, and though it is hinted that it may be followed by a supplementary volume—for Miss Ramann by no means restricts herself to detailing facts, but also often indulges in furnishing criticisms and analyses of Liszt's works—intending biographers on a smaller scale and writers of dictionary notices will find ample and interesting matter for the exercise of their pens.

Though the heading of the present notice, "Liszt's Biography," is suggestive of a review of Miss Ramann's entire work, we must restrict ourselves to speaking of its last instalment. This will probably be regarded as the most interesting of the series, from the fact that, probably for the first time, it furnishes us with a tolerably detailed account of the master's sojourn at Weimar (1848-61), which—he having retired from the world as a "pianiste ambulant"—gave birth to the most important of his musical and literary works. By no means its least interesting portion is that devoted to a biographical sketch of the Russian Princess, Carolyne von Sayn-Wittgenstein, a most remarkable woman, to whom Liszt was attracted far more by her extraordinary intellectual acquirements than by her personal appearance—for she was no beauty — and who exercised a strong influence over him in the way of encouraging him to occupy himself with musical composition, and who, acting as his amanuensis, did something more than assist him in his literary work, much of which owes its elaboration to her facile pen. Though at times Liszt dictated, at others he left it to her to do what she would with his thoughts. This accounts for much of the freedom and extravagance of diction (so different from that of his letters to Wagner and others) which obtains in some of his literary articles, many of which, originally written in French by the Princess, were, in the first instance, translated into German by the late lamented composer, Peter Cornelius, who, on discussing Liszt's article on the "Fliegende Holländer" with the present writer, remarked: "If you think of reproducing it in English, you will do well to eliminate much that is due to the Princess Wittgenstein."

It turns out that the first performance of "Lohengrin" (Weimar, August 28, 1850) was quite as much due to the Princess as to Liszt.

*"Franz Liszt: Als Künstler und Mensch." Von L. Ramann. Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel.

Liszt, in spite of his unqualified admiration for the work, was in doubt as to the expediency of being the first to bring it forward. The Princess argued that it was time that way should be made for Wagner. Liszt relented, and at once obtained the Grand Duke's approval. The much-abused term "music of the future," we learn, was also due to the Princess. It came about in the following manner: At a party at the Altenburg, after one of the early performances of "Lohengrin," which did not at once make its mark, as "Tannhäuser" had done, the Princess was discussing the work with the famous critic, F. Brendel, who maintained that "Lohengrin" was far in advance of the times, and had been brought forward too soon. "Then," retorted the Princess, "let us make music for the future." Liszt came in at the moment and caught up the expression, which he adopted at the next supper party by proposing as a toast "the musicians of the future." Progressionists welcomed the term, and enrolled themselves under the banner of the Future; but obstructionists soon adopted it as a term of contempt. For this reason, some years later, Brendel, at a large gathering of musicians, proposed the "New German School" as an appropriate substitute. This change was at once accepted by the progressionists, but it cannot be said, even now, that it has become one of general adoption.

Miss Ramann has much, which is both interesting and instructive, to tell about Liszt, both as a conductor and as a teacher.

She claims for him that, as a conductor, he reduced to a system the method inaugurated by Beethoven. This is explained by the statement that before Beethoven all instrumental music was based upon beauty of form and intellectual restrictedness (geistigen Gebundenheit), and that for the representation of this the "strict" style of conducting (i.e., beating the time of each bar and its constituent parts) was all-sufficient. When, with Beethoven's poetical ideas, romanticism and dramatic scenes entered into the scope of instrumental music, a more varied kind of accentuation ("free" conducting) became necessary. This consisted in indicating the phrasing of, it might be, long drawn-out passages, rather than in beating the time of each separate bar. "Periodic delivery" ("Periodische Vortrag") was the term which Liszt adopted for this portion of his method. As a whole, he characterised his system as "style in performance." Though Liszt effected much by his mien and gestures, it was one of his maxims that all, or nearly all, the conducting should be confined to the rehearsal, so that little or no help should be required from the conductor at a performance. Thus at performances, which had been adequately rehearsed, he would often stop beating time, and only resume doing so when it became actually necessary. It was an easy matter for him to familiarise the Weimar Orchestra with this method, but it was a method very naturally opposed when he came to stand before a strange orchestra. It is hardly necessary to state that his system of "periodic delivery," or "pantomimic conducting," as Mr. Manns has termed it, has been in the main adopted by nearly every competent conductor of the present day.

Probably no one ever had so many pupils as Liszt had. As a teacher of the pianoforte, opposed as he was to the cut and dried academical method, which put technical acquirements above intellectual reproduction, it was his wont to teach by precept and example. Not only would he play to his pupils, but he would exemplify to them what was to be done by reference to external circumstances, poetry, painting, sculpture, &c. As an example of this mode of procedure, Miss Ramann relates that on one occasion of his trying in vain to make a pupil comprehend the proper rendering of Chopin's tempo rubato, he took him up to the window and bade him look out. A strong wind was blowing. "Look at that tree," he said, "the leaves and twigs are swayed about by the wind, but the branches and trunk stand firm—that is tempo rubato."

This agrees with Chopin's dictum that the left hand is to be regarded as the conductor, who keeps strict time, but that certain liberties are to be allowed to the right—the "singing" hand. So much is this at variance with the practice of the majority of present-day Chopin-players, and the information to be derived from dictionaries, that it seems not out of place here to refer those interested in the matter of Chopin's tempo rubato (which widely differs from that of the Hungarian school, &c.) to the exhaustive account given of it on pp. 100-103 of Vol. II. of Professor Niecks's book on Chopin.*

Liszt pursued a similar course with his composition pupils, or rather, to be strictly within the mark, with the shoals of young composers who were never tired of pestering him for his advice and criticism in regard to their immature attempts. In the kindliest way he was always ready to look at their manuscripts, and, without laying down the law, would remark: "This passage might have been otherwise," or "I should prefer it thus"—illustrating his meaning on the pianoforte. An amusing anecdote is told of a certain Rudolf Viole, a young composer, who, one fine summer morning, brought him a sonata in a single movement, after Liszt's design. The master sat at his writing-table, pen in hand. Pointing to a far-fetched modulation, he remarked: "That won't do." "Why not?" retorted the young composer, "it sounds quite well." "No!" replied Liszt, "it won't do, and ought not to be so." On Viole still continuing to dispute the point, Liszt, waxing warm, rose from his seat, and advancing towards the young obstinate, filliped his pen full of ink on to his newly-starched white waistcoat, and remarked: "That, too, will do, but it ought not to be."

Several amusing anecdotes are told, for the first time, we believe, of Liszt's coming into contact with other composers. Here is a good one of his meeting with Schumann at Düsseldorf early in the fifties. At an afternoon party Schumann was all agog to hear Liszt play. Liszt had brought a new concert-piece with him, and sitting down at the pianoforte, Schumann sat down by his side, to turn over the leaves of his manuscript. Before Liszt had played a few pages, Schumann edged back his chair, and by the time the performance was concluded, he had vanished, having edged himself right away back to the door! Curious, it seems, that Schumann, who himself was for long regarded as a musical heretic, should have taken offence at Liszt's progressiveness, and should thus have posed as a true conservative!

As hinted above, a large part of Miss Ramann's book is devoted to analyses, with copious musical examples, of Liszt's Symphonic Poems, &c. All honour to the lady who sets herself such a task! But it must be confessed that, in the absence of a performance and of a full score, such essays, helpful as they may be to students, are thrown away upon the general reader. Nevertheless, without them and the account given of Liszt's literary works the book would be incomplete.

It would be easy to enlarge upon its contents. But we refrain from attempting this in the hope that the complete work may some day be issued in an adequate English version.

FROM MY STUDY.

Maria Felicita Malibran, whose portrait is given herewith, lives not only in history, but in song. Her sudden and tragic death in mid-career extinguished so much of the world's delight that the popular imagination was excited as on few occasions of a like sort, and the curious in such matters may, by searching the periodicals of 1836, judge for themselves how greatly the sympathies of England were stirred. A poet, who may be recognised by his initials, "L. B.," exclaimed—

O God, that life should float
On many a golden note,
When the sweet singer's lips have changed to ashes!
That we should see—(as now
I see her fine pale brow)—
Things that have passed away like lightning flashes.

Oh, never, never more
Will Nature's self restore
The treasure vanish'd like a star swift falling;
Down to the deep it goes
In hush'd and dark repose,
Leaving the wondering gazer vainly calling.

Yes, all that World of Life,
Of passion and wild strife,
The strife of soul, the ecstasy of feeling;
That mind which held the mirth
Of Eden more than Earth—
That world of life the grave is now concealing.

Her voice, Love's unseen lute,
Oh! say it is not mute;
Still, still within us is its music ringing;
Long may we hear in her
Our heart's interpreter,
Long hoard the marvels of her matchless singing.

Thus, in lower or in higher strains, sang the universal Muse, amid the darkness that followed the extinction of a great light.

The sudden death of Madame Patey brought to mind the circumstances under which Malibran was taken from the scene of her triumphs. No fantastic legend can grow up around the plain record of facts, since there were witnesses, among them Mrs. Vincent Novello, who committed their testimony to paper immediately after the event of September 23, 1836. Malibran fell from her horse in April of the same year, and was injudicious enough to conceal the accident from her husband, De Beriot. The result was frequent and prolonged suffering, which had a deadly effect upon an abnormally sensitive organisation. As to the great singer's peculiarities in this respect, there is a statement from the pen of Mr. Belinaye, a London physician, who had an intimate knowledge of her constitution. According to this witness, Malibran over-strained her nervous system at an early age, and was "subject to fits of hysteria, akin to epilepsy, and to attacks of catalepsy, such as I have never seen elsewhere and hope never to see again." He describes one of the cataleptic fits: "Her whole frame became immovable, and as suddenly as if she had been converted into a statue by the wand of an enchanter. She remained standing for two hours, neither hearing nor seeing any external object." Mr. Belinaye goes on to tell how, on suddenly waking from the trance, she flung herself down a flight of steps, and how, on the morrow, she went to the King's Theatre to appear in "Semiramide," though unable to stand. She was dressed for her part while sitting, "and when the moment came that she was to appear, to the unutterable astonishment of her friends, she rushed on the stage and drew down thunders of applause by her unrivalled acting and singing." It can easily be understood that upon such a nature as this long months of pain would operate surely if slowly towards the moment when the "silver cord" would snap.

The story of the terrible death-bed at Manchester has been told a thousand times and, even after the lapse of sixty years, one does not care to dwell upon it. It is enough to read a few lines which appeared in the Morning Post: "Her agonising cries that night will not be erased from the memory of the writer of this article, who was within a short distance of the room in which she expired. She constantly ejaculated 'Je m'étouffe—O mon cher ami.'" That a creature so beautiful and gifted should thus perish is one of those mysteries at which we must wonder, and against which we may even be tempted impotently to revolt, but can neither understand nor know where to go for an explanation. And she was only twenty-eight!"

That writers in the public press and elsewhere commented upon Malibran's death in almost rhapsodical terms surprises none who now read their words. Making allowance for the working of the emotions such an event could not fail to stir, we get at the facts of Malibran's personality and genius. Here are a few testimonies. As to her face:

"It has been said that she was not handsome. She certainly had not a drawing-master's eyes, nose, and mouth; but if a face capable of expressing every emotion of the mind be not the very essence of beauty, we prefer what the common observer would term plainness."

As to her character:

"With what affectionate reminiscence do we not run back, and retrace every 'trick and line of her sweet favour'; recalling all her grandeur of soul, her womanly generosity—prodigal, uncalculating, trusting, boundless;—her merry quirks; her humorous sallies; her flashes of genius! Gracious be their memory, for she deserved all our honour and sympathy. She was the greatest genius in her particular walk in life, and, what is better, she was a right noble woman."

As to her voice and its use:

"Her voice, which was a contralto in character, took a range that was perfectly astonishing. We have heard her descend to F and E flat below the lower C in the treble clef, and reach C and D in alt. In execution she kept the listener in a state of wonderment, and in the most complicated fiorituri she not only performed all that the most flexible mechanicians could achieve, but even then beat them in their own stronghold, for she was sure to add some exquisite grace entirely her own, and we venture to say that no mortal ever heard her sing the same piece precisely alike, or repeat a cadence when she has been encored. . . . Her principal characteristic, however, was expression—and expression in all its features, shades, and varieties, from its loftiest epic flight, embracing the sublime of anger and the profound of pathos, down to the winning, the playful, and even the burlesque."

Charles Auguste de Beriot, Malibran's second husband, does not kindle the enthusiasm which the very name of his gifted wife serves to light up. He was of much commoner clay, although belonging to an old and esteemed family, and a violinist of great distinction. Born at Louvain in 1802, De Beriot began to play in public at nine years of age, and continued his career as performer and teacher till 1852, when sudden blindness compelled his retirement. He died at Brussels in 1870. Violinists still know this artist by his numerous compositions, but by the general musical public he is best remembered as the husband of his wife—as the man of whom Malibran is said to have been devotedly fond. In that capacity, however, a shadow still continues to rest upon his good name. All England, moved to grief by the loss of a great and favourite artist, was horrified to hear, at the same time, that De Beriot, leaving the body of his dead wife to be buried by strangers, had hurried to Brussels, in order, as was very broadly asserted, to look after the deceased lady's property. The Times took the matter up in a severe manner, and thundered its loudest against the offender. This may have been hasty judgment, but assuredly the conduct of De Beriot called for explanation, which, after no long interval, was forthcoming. A Dr. Belluomini came forward to show why the new-made widower ran away, and that there were good reasons for his doing so. In the first place, according to this champion, it could not be wrong for a foreigner to follow the custom established on the greater part of the Continent. Are we to understand by this that the majority of Continental husbands see the breath out of their wives and then betake themselves to travel? Belluomini added that De Beriot, having neither slept nor eaten for nine days, was in such a state of body and mind that it became necessary to remove him from a place where everything contributed to augment his trouble. Such a state of things is conceivable; but this exhausted and broken-down man, whose wife died on Friday within a few minutes of midnight, was well enough to travel by coach from Manchester to London, reaching the Metropolis in time to catch the Antwerp boat between nine and ten on Sunday morning. Pretty good work for a man bowed down by fasting and distress. The Doctor appeared to have very little faith in his own argument, and went on to say that if De Beriot had acted wrongly the blame shall be upon him (Belluomini) as the stricken man's instigator and adviser.

The reply of the Times contained some nasty questions: "Is it true, as alleged, and believed at Manchester, that M. de Beriot gave instructions for his wife's burial two hours before she died? Is it true, as alleged and believed at Manchester, that during a part of that time he and his medical friend were employed in packing up the jewels and dresses of the still living wife, in order to carry them away to Brussels?" I can find no reply to these queries. A Manchester merchant, Mr. Beale, saw to the interment of the forsaken remains, and the interests of Malibran's son, Wilfrid de Beriot, were very promptly looked after by a council in which Rossini, Nourrit, Traupenas, Herz, and Schlesinger took part.

De Beriot—it must be said for him—had the wit to see what a mistake he had made, and wrote to the Boroughreeve of Manchester, "entreating in earnest terms the delivering into his own possession of the remains of his wife." The letter was referred to the Festival committee, who, after consultation, advised a flat refusal, on the ground that the body had been forsaken and the interment left to strangers. This reason the Musical World called "remarkable," adding that the committee "did not sufficiently make allowance for peculiar emotions under such a bereavement." The emotions which prompt a mourning widower to put hundreds of miles between his wife's body and himself at the earliest possible moment must be peculiar indeed.

Henrietta Sontag was born (May 13, 1805) to the stage and bred in the atmosphere of the footlights. Germany, like England, had its families of artists, to one of which she belonged; from her earliest infancy leading a nomadic life, wandering from place to place with her relatives, and doing, even at the tender age of six years, what she could in the interest of the common weal. The child had seen but half-a-dozen summers when she played Salome in a popular opera called "The Daughter of the Danube." "On that occasion," says a biographer, "she was admired for the infantile graces of her person and the correctness of her voice." No small share of "rough and tumble," however, marked Sontag's early experience of life till, in 1814, she went to Prague and distinguished herself by playing children's parts under the direction of Weber, who was then director of the music at the Bohemian Opera-house. Here the young artist gave such promise of future distinction that she was permitted to study at the Conservatoire, although not old enough to satisfy the rules. Presently came the supreme chance of her life. The prima donna being ill, Sontag, then a girl of fifteen, was offered her part—that of the Princess of Navarre in Boieldieu's "Jean de Paris." "The facility of her voice," says the authority already quoted, "her budding beauty, the trouble which made her heart full of mysterious presentiments, won for her a success which augured well for the future of her talent." She was now fairly launched upon the uncertain waves of an operatic career.

It is impossible to follow Sontag's course minutely, and I pass on to 1824, when she accepted an engagement at the German Opera in Leipzig. Then, far more than now, Teutonic singers were overshadowed by Italian artists, and the Germans were delighted to find in Sontag a prima donna apparently destined to take the place once held by Mara, and to be the "bright, particular star" of the national stage. "The admirers of this great artist's genius," it is said, "were composed of the youth of the universities, and of all the ardent and generous souls who wished to redeem Germany from foreign domination, as well in the realm of imagination as in that of politics. . . . They felt obliged to Sontag for consecrating a magnificent organ, and a vocalisation far from common on that side of the Rhine, to the rendering of the strong and deep music of Weber, Beethoven, and Spohr, and of all the new German composers who had broken truce with foreign impiety and given full scope to the genius of their country. Surrounded with homage, celebrated by all the beaux esprits, sung by the students and escorted by the huzzas of the German press, Sontag was called to Berlin, where she made her début with immense success." It is even said that the Hegelian philosophers "made her the subject of their learned commentaries, and hailed, in her limpid and sonorous voice, the blending of the subjective with the objective in an absolute unity." This, however, must be a joke, and was, no doubt, made in Paris.

"I never loved a dear gazelle," &c. Germany soon had to sing that plaintive strain, for Sontag had no thought of sacrificing herself on the altar of nationality. Like all other prime donne, she preferred a brilliant personal triumph to everything else. She longed for music more adapted to display her vocal means than that of the German composers; she dreamed of success on boards more illustrious than those of Berlin or Leipzig, and so, in 1826, took up her abode in Paris, leaving her fellow-countrymen disconsolate, and, it may be, just a little angry. In Paris, Sontag had to encounter the rivalry of Malibran, and a fierce struggle for supremacy resulted between the Spanish Juno and the Teutonic Venus. I regret to say that the ladies carried the war into private life. They were compelled to meet on the stage, but they would not both be seen in the same saloon, and when they appeared in the same opera each did her very best to sing the other down. Says an imaginative writer: "Their vocal Congreve rockets set the audience on fire. Now the Trojans and now the Greeks carried it. The parterre rose and subsided like the waves of the sea under the Olympic deities." In time the great rivals, becoming weary of a struggle wherein neither could definitely conquer, shook hands and made it up.

Not long afterwards, Cupid did for Malibran what her own powers could not achieve, and removed Sontag out of the way, the German artist becoming the wife of Count Rossi and (January, 1830) bidding, as she thought, a final adieu to the scene of her triumphs. During this first part of her stage career, Sontag several times appeared in London as a member of the Opera company. It was here, indeed—at a concert for the benefit of Mr. Ella—that she and Malibran agreed to be friends.

Countess Rossi had twenty years of life as a grande dame, and then came distress, both husband and wife losing their fortune in the revolutionary storm of 1848-9. Reduced to poverty, Sontag determined to resume her place on the stage, and accepted, from Lumley, an offer of £17,000 for the season of 1849. She was then forty-four years old, and, of course, not in the prime of her attraction as actress or singer. Moreover, she had to contend against the Jenny Lind "fever," which practically put all others out of the field. In 1850, and again in 1851 and 1852, Sontag visited London.

There is little more to tell. In 1852 Sontag accepted an engagement in America, where success was great and pecuniary reward plentiful. She next visited Mexico, and died in the capital of that country, June 17, 1854. The remains were brought to Europe and interred in the Abbey of Marienstern.

It is curious, as completing a certain parallel between Malibran and Sontag, that Count Rossi quitted Mexico immediately after his wife's death, "leaving the body to be sent to the port by a carrier, with other parcels."

The following observations upon the gifted songstress are taken from the works of Scudo, the eminent French critic: "In the magnificent casket of vocal gems which Sontag displayed every night before her admirers, we especially remarked the limpidity of her chromatic scales and the brilliancy of her trills, which sparkled like rubies on a velvet ground. Each note of those long-descending spirals stood out as if it had been struck isolatedly, and attached to the following note by an imperceptible and delicate solder, and all these marvels were accomplished with a perfect grace, never disfiguring her countenance by the slightest sign of effort. Her charming figure, her fine limpid and soft eyes, her elegant form and her stature, springing and supple as the stem of a young poplar, finished the picture and completed the enchantment."

"Ten thousand sat
Patiently present at a sacred song
Commemoration mad; content to hear
Messiah's eulogy for Handel's sake."

This was Cowper's way of putting an important question connected with the performance of sacred oratorio for purposes of entertainment, and not a few worthy Christian people still think that Cowper and his friend, John Newton, were quite right in lifting up their voices against what they held to be a form of sacrilege. Members of the Society of Friends have greatly distinguished themselves in asserting this opinion, and it must be fresh in recollection that a Quaker Mayor of Leeds, who held office in a Festival year, issued an address excusing himself from taking the part usually assigned to the civic chief on such occasions. Looking through a "Life of Joseph Sturge," the Birmingham corn merchant and philanthropist, I found interesting evidence as to his views on the subject. When the Town Hall was built (1830) Birmingham was governed, not by a Mayor and Corporation, but by a body known as Commissioners of the Birmingham Street Act. Sturge had been elected a member of this Board, but, presumably, was not one of those who procured an Act of Parliament authorising the erection of a Town Hall, and providing that the building should, from time to time, be placed at the disposal of the Governors of the General Hospital for the purpose of holding Musical Festivals in support of that Institution. This clause offended the good Quaker very much. The hall was to be built out of public taxation, and Sturge held that it was a violation of religious liberty to tax persons for the support of anything which they conscientiously believed to be inconsistent with Christianity. As combative and bold as his co-religionist, John Bright, Sturge was not content with a mere protest against the clause. He issued a circular to the Commissioners, stating that he intended moving a resolution worded as follows at the next meeting: "That no money be expended on the Town Hall with a view to its being appropriated to the performances of the oratorios, and that an early application be made to Parliament for the repeal of that part of the present Act which places it occasionally under the control of the Musical Committee of the General Hospital." The resolution having been moved, seconded, discussed, and rejected, Sturge promptly retired from the Commission, and issued an appeal to the public asking them "calmly to consider whether they could with propriety attend a performance involving the profanation of the most serious subjects which the human mind can contemplate, by their application to purposes of amusement." The Festival took place, as a matter of course, and then the indefatigable Quaker issued a final address beginning thus: "The excitement of the Festival is over; retire now to your closets and—with that sacred volume before you from which the most momentous truths have been extracted to be sung for your amusement by actors and actresses and to be mixed up in the same entertainment with the fancy ball and the songs and glees of the stage—ask yourselves the question whether . . . you can stand guiltless in the sight of God for the sanction and encouragement you have given to the prostitution of this infinitely solemn subject."

Sturge's rigid views did not prevail, nor was it well they should; but one can readily see why devout minds were offended by musical Festivals as carried on sixty years ago. Works of sacred art dealing with themes of the highest religious import were certainly out of place when associated with fancy balls and the rest of the "attractions of Festival week." Sturge and his associates, though their end was not fully gained, did not labour in vain. All the objectionable features against which they protested have long since been removed, and now a musical celebration is innocent of offence against any but such as hold that sacred themes should be not dealt with at all, save in religious worship.

On the appointed day, March 3, I was early at my pianoforte, in festive attire ready for the dinner, with the scores of the cantata and "Correggio" before me. The door opened. Was it a dream, or did my eyes deceive me? There stood Beethoven! Was it possible for this great master so to honour a youth of twenty-two as to take the trouble to ascend to the fourth floor to fetch his guest? I was as confused as a schoolboy, but he quickly put me at my ease, and said he wanted to have a look at my rooms, my instruments and books, the portraits of my parents, my studies in counterpoint—even a few drawings—all were examined with attention. Beethoven never did anything superficially; everything was at once engraved on his memory as if his eyes did duty for his ears also. I was proud to walk through the streets with such a companion. When we reached the Kothgasse, we were received by a matronly housekeeper, who ushered us into the room where a table was nicely laid for dinner, and where Beethoven acted host in the most charming manner. He himself prepared the coffee, in some new kind of pot, which he minutely explained. Our conversation soon became animated, and I told him how much pleasure it would give his admirers if he would make a trip to the Rhinelands; but I fear I recalled some painful reminiscences, for his manner became at once strained and reserved. After a pause he replied: "At one time I had made up my mind to leave Vienna, and to accept some of my very pressing and lucrative invitations to go abroad, especially to England; but my friend and pupil, the Archduke Rudolph, Archbishop of Olmütz, would not hear of it. He spoke to his brother (the Emperor), to Esterhazy, Lichtenstein, and the other princes, who arranged that a fixed sum should be granted me, so that I might be free from cares and worries and remain in Vienna. So then I decided to stay, began Concerts, and so on; but though this promise was properly legalised, it was never realised, and they none of them kept their word"! Then Beethoven added, with bitterness: "What do the aristocracy of birth and wealth understand of the ideal life of an artist? They only look for enjoyment and pleasure in life: and I was soon altogether abandoned. I must work to live." These are Beethoven's own words, truthfully and literally repeated; but I must add that after his death the property in stocks, &c., that he left rather contradicted his complaints, and I suppose he did not wish to touch his capital, which he left to his nephew.

As this conversation seemed evidently to excite him, I turned to my scores and handed them to him, so as to change his thoughts. We went into the next room, where was an open pianoforte, which I saw at once, by its shape, was not Viennese. It was one that Broadwood had sent him, and on it were some works of Handel, presented to him by the London Philharmonic Society as a mark of their esteem. I told him that I had heard his Scotch songs lately, at Frau von Cibbini's. "Go there often," he said, "you will hear good music there. She plays my sonatas better than anyone in Vienna."

I then took leave, thanking him for the time he had devoted to me. He appointed April 6 to give me his opinion of my compositions, and also begged me to present a letter to Baron von Türckheim, adding: "A countryman of yours, a Mr. André, from Offenbach, called on me this morning. Do you know him?" I answered "yes," but he said nothing further, which rather surprised me, as Beethoven never made the smallest remark without a reason.

With mingled feelings of joy and anxiety, I went to Beethoven's on the day appointed. My compositions had already been approved of by my professor, Seyfried, and later they were performed in public; but my artistic pride shrank from the fear of adding to the poor and empty works with which Beethoven was constantly bothered. I stood before him bashfully and respectfully, but he at once cheered me by the kindly expression on his face. "Bravo, my young friend," said he; "your 'Correggio' and your cantata please me very much. The score shows that you occupy a position in the orchestra, and that you are not a mere student—that you thoroughly know the effect of the various instruments; the form is satisfactory, and proves that you understand light and shade divided between the voices and the instruments, which give the work good harmonious colour. This I have to praise; but I have also to find fault. Much is too unsteady, stormy, and impatient. Your imagination runs away with you in some parts. The ideas are disconnected; I miss concentration, which instead of splitting its force, confines itself to principal and counter subjects. You give too much; less would have produced more unity and more pleasing symmetry. But that is the fault of youth, which would soar as high as possible—the ferment of youth in head and heart, which imagines it can never do enough. Time will cure that, and I infinitely prefer a superabundance of creative talent to the lack of it. Play a great deal of Bach, and everything will become clear to you."

I listened with profound attention to Beethoven's words, my eyes fastened on his sparkling eyes, and watching his eloquent mouth I ventured to say, "How must one set about it? How has your genius guided you to this knowledge?"

"I carry my ideas with me for a long time," said he, "frequently a very long time, before I write them down. My memory is so reliable that I am certain, even after years, never to forget a subject which I have once created. I alter a little, reject a little, and try again, until I feel I am satisfied and have found the right. Then begins, in my head, the process of working it out; and as I am fully conscious of what I want, the original idea never leaves me, but it rises, it grows; I see it in my mind until it is a complete picture. The committing it to paper I do fast enough, and though I have sometimes several different works in hand, I never confuse one with another. Where I take my ideas from I can hardly say; they come by themselves, directly or indirectly, from nature—in the woods—walking in the silence of the night—at sunrise; they are induced by certain moods, expressed by the poet in words, by me in music. As they roar and storm and sound I could almost grasp them with my hands, until at last I see them before me in notes."

These words of Beethoven were, to me, as an æsthetic lesson, showing me the inner working of his mind and the process of his creations. I now again mentioned the great success of his "Fidelio," and how the German nation was longing for a second opera. "That is all well said," he replied, "but where is a good libretto? I get pretty verses from many poets, but they have no idea of the requirements of a musician. I neither will nor can write anything frivolous. Grillparzer has promised me a book ('Melusina'). I have most faith in him, and we shall see what will come of it." "And quartets and sonatas?" I asked. He assured me that several manuscripts were already in the hands of the publishers. These were the String Quartets, Op. 127, 130, 132, 135, and the Sonatas, Op. 109, 110, 111, which had been sent in 1822 to Schlesinger in Paris, and to which I shall refer later on. Beethoven then asked me to give a letter to Baron von Türckheim, whom I saw almost daily. I had stayed a long time with Beethoven, and felt completely dazed when I left his august presence; so much so, that I wandered about in quite a different direction to what I had intended. How different had I found this great man to the pictures drawn of him! Instead of rough and sombre, irascible and imperious, he had been kindness, gentleness, and friendliness personified, and throughout our intercourse this amiability was unfailing. I must therefore doubt many of the tales circulated about him. I met him once in the street, when he said: "If you have time come with me to the Paternoster Gässel, to my General Steiner (so he nicknamed his publisher); I want to give him a bit of my mind. These publishers all try to postpone the publication of my compositions, with all manner of excuses. Perhaps they think to make more money by waiting until after my death, but I know how to tackle them." I was surprised to see how faultlessly Beethoven was attired to-day, so contrary to his usual habits—elegant white trousers, vest, and necktie; a blue dress-coat with brass buttons, and a high hat stuck on the back of his head, as was his wont. On mentioning this to my professor, Mayseder, who lived close by, he said no doubt his friends had taken away his old clothes and put the new ones in their place. "Beethoven would not notice, and would put these on in perfect absence of mind; it has happened so before." Of course I do not know if this was the case, but I must say that I, personally, never noticed the smallest dreaminess on his part.

I had now been two years in Vienna, and my stay was drawing to a close. I was going on to Paris to continue my studies there, at the Conservatoire, which, under the direction of the illustrious Cherubini, and with professors like Lesueur, Reicha, &c., was then at its zenith. My first farewell visit was to Beethoven, my ever paternal friend; and though I had told him of my intended departure, his kind heart seemed quite grieved to hear it was so near. There was something touching in his voice, a moisture in his eyes, and as he embraced me I could have knelt before him. I took the slate and began to write some words of gratitude, but he at once stayed my hand. "Thanks," he said, "are out of place between us. All I did came from my heart, and now be firm and courageous. Come again to Vienna; I shall give you a few letters and commissions for Paris, which I know you will attend to. Tell the publisher, Schlesinger, that I know very well why the publication of my works is so long delayed, and that I will submit to it no longer."

The day before my departure I was busy, with the help of my friend and countryman, the painter Würst, packing my belongings, when, to my surprise and delight, Beethoven entered my room. He said he came only to give me the letters he had promised me, of introduction to Cherubini and to Schlesinger, and, in case I had been out, brought also the following letter he had written to me, with instructions as to what he wished done in Paris.

My dear Schloesser,—I enclose a letter to Cherubini and one for Schlesinger. You must enquire the address of the latter at Steiner's, Paternoster Gässel. Only mention that I send you with an introduction to Schlesinger. Say all manner of nice things for me to Cherubini—that I desire nothing so much as to hear soon of another opera by him; that I entertain for him of all living composers the profoundest admiration; that I trust he has received my letter, and that I shall soon hear from him. At Schlesinger's, ask also if he has received and delivered the letter to Cherubini? Also why I have not yet had any copies of the C minor Sonata? Now I would ask you to be so good as to write to me from Paris on both these matters, Cherubini and Schlesinger. At the Paris Post Office, where the letters are put in a box, do not forget to pay the postage, otherwise one cannot get these letters without writing to Paris for them. May Heaven give you all blessings; I shall always take the liveliest interest in you.—Yours very truly, Beethoven.

He then presented me with an album-leaf with the heading, "Words by Goethe, music by Beethoven. Vienna, May, 1823." It was a canon for six voices, with the words "Edel sei der Mensch, hilfreich und gut."* And on the page at the back he had written, "A happy journey, my dear Schloesser. May everything happen according to your wishes. Yours very truly, Beethoven." With fervent gratitude I received this proof of his friendship; a shake of the hand, a farewell glance, and we parted. I watched him until he vanished from my sight.

In the morning Seyfried, Mayseder, Worzischeck, and Dembscher accompanied me to the coach office, and with many "Glückwünsche" I started for Paris, where my first care was to attend to the commissions given me by Beethoven. I must not close this sketch without telling the reader how helpful and powerful his great name proved, when I presented myself at the Conservatoire. Cherubini received me politely, but coldly, and, to my thinking, very unsympathetically. I explained to him my wish to enter the Conservatoire, showed him letters from the Hessian embassy, printed and manuscript music of my composition, &c.; but he declined my request, saying that the Conservatoire was essentially a French national institution, and that only Frenchmen could be admitted. I knew of several instances where this edict of Cherubini's had been put aside by high official influence, but I felt I had other means. I took from my pocket Beethoven's letter to Cherubini, who quickly read it, and re-read it. Then, in an instant, the aspect of things changed, and instead of the cold, sharply chiselled face with contracted eyebrows, quite a different genial-looking man asked me after Beethoven, his health and his compositions, and before I left Cherubini said, "It is against the rules to enter you as a student at the Conservatoire, but I will enter you as an 'auditeur,' which will give you the same rights of instruction in evey branch, and you can choose your own professors. Write this to Beethoven, who has recommended you so warmly, and give him my kind greetings."

This gave me all I required, and during the two years I spent in Paris I became acquainted, and mixed intimately with all the artistic celebrities of the time, including Cherubini, who often invited me to his house to play quartets, &c. I wrote to Beethoven, telling him all that might interest him. I never saw him again.

THE CATHEDRAL PARAGRAPH PSALTER.

It is one of the most healthy signs of the vitality of our English Choral Services that such increasing attention should be given to the proper rendering of the Psalms. The real problem is, how can the deep meanings of these inspired lyrics be best shown, and their teaching be best enforced by a musical treatment which will not be too complicated for congregational use, nor too full of change to exercise a disturbing influence either on those who sing or those who listen? The difficulty of the problem is sufficiently proved by the perpetual attempts which are made to solve it; disappointment and failure in one quarter only seem to give immediate impulse to fresh attempts in another. When Gregorian Chants are used, the obligation of illustrating the form and meaning of the words devolves for the most part on the organist, except in those elaborate Psalters which direct the choir from time to time to desert unison singing and burst into harmony. This important function of an organist, as we all know, is one that is rarely carried out satisfactorily. It is doubtful if much can be done even when the circumstances are entirely favourable, but the sad part of the matter is, that such a lot of mischief may be done if the duty should fall into bad hands. What remarkable commentaries on the Psalms have not many of us heard from the fingers of an ultra-modern organist playing on a brand new organ. Shade of Helmore! many an organist has revenged himself on you for your mistake in making one and the same Tone do duty for all the morning or evening Psalms, whether historical, penitential, Messianic; or whether internally requiring change.

Nor were matters improved when the clergy sometimes put a stop to the organist's vagaries and decided to get rapidly through the Psalms without any attempt at musical illustration. Almost before one side of the choir had fairly finished a verse, the other side had commenced the next, thus producing the effect of a sort of game at musical shuttlecock. The congregation could join in this game; but what about the interpretation of the words? Thoughtful and practical men like the late Rev. R. Brown-Borthwick have approached the subject from the opposite side, regardless of "congregational" requirements. Take, for example, the setting of Psalm lxxviii. (fifteenth evening), which he used in All Saints' Church, Scarborough. It is dramatic, forcible, and edifying, but it is not many stages removed from a veritable service or anthem. Could any congregation hear it often enough to become familiar with it? perhaps yes, if there could be a whole month of "fifteenth evenings"; but under ordinary circumstances the effect of this elaborate setting is to put the hearers into that uncomfortable state of mind which is always muttering "I wonder what next!" On the whole, the ordinary Anglican Chant, whether single or double, has been a useful compromise; but have not all genuine church musicians felt that it was, after all, only a compromise? If any one person in England could be found to suggest and formulate a sensible, logical, and practical middle course between an ordinary chant and an extraordinary sort of "chant service," Dr. Troutbeck clearly is the man. A good musician, a learned theologian, an ex-choirmaster and precentor; a man whose experience has pointed out to him, on the one side, the needs of congregations, and, on the other, the limitation of the powers and possibilities of a choir and organist—who, for the greater part of their lifetime, have to sing or play through the whole book of Psalms every month—he has wisely set his hand to the task; and the work before us is a convincing proof that he has succeeded. He has not, indeed he could not, move in the direction which he has taken without finding other workers on the trail; nor have we any desire to under-estimate or disparage the efforts already made, notably in Peterborough Cathedral, to bring a Paragraph Psalter into use; we can only regret that the success of such efforts has remained within so limited a sphere. But although Westcott's Psalter appeared before Dr. Troutbeck had been able to realize his own earlier design, the book before us proves that he was most wise not to relinquish it altogether, for he has been able, since the publication of Westcott's Psalter, to embody the result of much accumulated musical experience, and also to take an independent view of the paragraphing itself. In many Psalms of course the paragraphs—which may be described as poetic stanzas depending for their lengths on the completion of a thought rather than on any laws of versification—fall so naturally into their required shape that Troutbeck and Westcott are identical; but where the paragraphing of the two Psalters diverges, it is easy to see that Dr. Troutbeck has had sound reasons for his own division. Take, for example, Psalms xxv., li., liii., in which the grouping of the verses in the Cathedral Paragraph Psalter brings out the force and meaning of the words to a remarkable degree.

The obvious gain of a Paragraph Psalter is that the very construction of the lyric is made to illustrate its line of thought; in short, the Psalm is made to teach itself: and only those who have studied a Paragraph Psalter can have the least idea what a flood of light is thrown upon these ancient pages by the mere act of forming paragraphs. Dr. Troutbeck does not, however, teaze the singers by unnecessary changes of music; Psalm xxv., for instance, is directed to be sung simply to a "single or double chant, major or minor." But in cases where a lesson can be taught by the introduction of a fresh chant or the alternation of chants, he does not hesitate to do so. Perhaps his treatment of Psalm lxxviii. may be examined as an admirable example of the effect to be obtained by the use of two double chants and occasional unison singing; and the directions to the choir are so clearly given that the smallest chorister-boy would need more ingenuity to make a mistake than to avoid one. For a specimen of the exposition of a Psalm by means of contrasting a single and double chant, Psalm cvii. should be examined; for an effective use of two single chants, Psalm cxviii. deserves notice; and, of course, Psalms which naturally fall into groups of three verses, like Psalm cxxxvii., demand special triple chants.

It must not be supposed that Dr. Troutbeck intends to foist on the shoulders of organists or precentors the arduous duty of finding chants to suit the Psalter; a chant book for the whole month with clear and ample directions corresponding with those printed in the Psalter is, we understand, ready for immediate issue.

We have not yet done with this excellent outcome of Dr. Troutbeck's labours: he knows well enough that one of the most annoying, as well perhaps as one of the most widespread, faults of choirs is to rest unduly on the syllable which bears the accent and then to scamper in hot haste through any syllables or words which lie between it and the first upright bar. He knows that people seem determined not to read the Preface to the Cathedral Psalter and not to obey the directions it so clearly gives. But Dr. Troutbeck has adopted a system which removes this sin from the category of possibilities; he places heads of notes over the accent and succeeding syllables in such a way that the singer's course is plain. The first two verses of the Venite will show how valuable these indications are:

O come, let us sĭng | unto · the | Lord:
let us heartily rejoĭce in thĕ | strength of | our sal- | -vation.
Let us come before his prĕs-ĕnce with | thanks- | giving:
and shĕw our-sĕlves | glad in | him with | psalms.

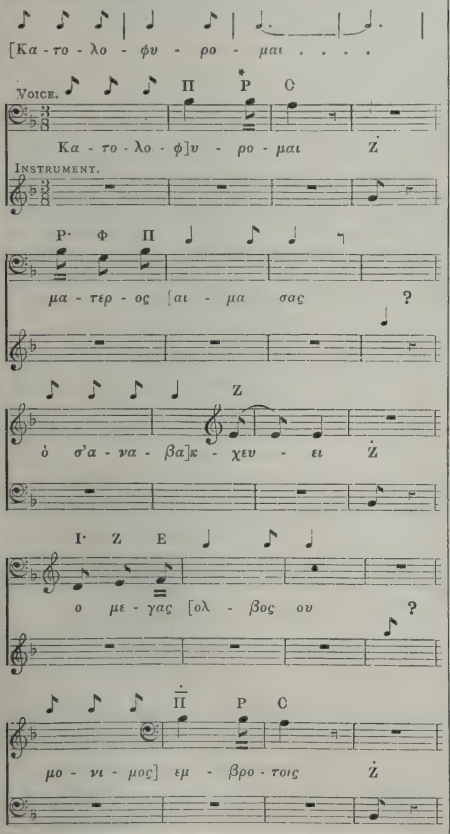
It will also be seen from the preceding that each half-verse has a line to itself. This involves, of course, the expenditure of space, but it is a manifest gain in point of clearness. The "brief notes on the Psalter" which follow the Preface will be of much value and interest to all those whose privilege it is to sing these "songs of Zion."

In conclusion, from whatever point this new form of the Cathedral Psalter be viewed, it will be found to have sterling merits, and we are much mistaken if it does not prove the commencement of a new era in the history of chanting. If any man, lay or clerical, musical or unmusical, hopes to find some short-cut to good chanting, which will make no demands on his time or trouble, he will be (as he deserves to be) always disappointed; and he must, we suppose, be allowed to go on attributing his failure to the shortcomings of the Psalter he uses. We all know that in the long run good chanting is heard only where conscientious and painstaking preparation exists also; but it will be found that the results of long experience and sound learning embodied in this Psalter reduce the dangers of bad chanting to a minimum, and point a clear path leading to an intelligent and devout rendering of the Psalms if clergy and choirs will only follow it.

In the French Archæological School at Athens, on March 29, the Hymn to Apollo discovered in November last at Delphi was sung before a large and distinguished audience by a quartet of male voices. It was given also in Paris, at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, on the 11th ult., its interpreter on this occasion being a lady, Mme. Jeanne Reinach. As the hymn (which, by the way, has been translated into modern notation by M. Theodore Reinach) is the property of the French Archæological School, and has, moreover, not even been published, we are not yet able to present it to the readers of The Musical Times—this may be possible on a future occasion. In the meantime, a description of it will no doubt prove interesting. The preservation of this most valuable relic—which dates from the third century before Christ—is due to the fact that it was inscribed on marble, the two tablets bearing it having been found during the excavation of a building said to have been used as a treasure house. There are twenty-three lines of text, and about eighty bars of music, containing five beats in a bar. The hymn was written to celebrate a victory of the Athenians over the Gauls, and appears to have been the work which won the prize at a competition which is known to have then taken place. Its author's name is not given. It contains invocations to Apollo and to the Muses. The end is missing—this was probably a prayer. The melody, in the Dorian mode (e, f, g, a, b, c, d, e, with a as key-note), is full of dignity and expression. Its first portion moves by skips; in the second, chromatic intervals occur; and the third returns to the style of the first. Its similarity to the Shepherd's Song in Wagner's "Tristan" proves how little that is under the sun can ever be new.

While on the subject of Ancient Greek music we may as well deal with two other relics which have recently been rendered into modern notation—we believe, for the first time—by Mr. C. F. Abdy

Williams. These are: (1) the fragment of a papyrus roll belonging to the Augustan age, containing the music to a chorus from the "Orestes" of Euripides; and (2) a portion of a hymn inscribed on stone by one Seikilos of Tralles, which is given in the fifth volume of "Mittheilungen aus der sammlung der Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer," in an article by Mr. K. Wesseley. The "Orestes" fragment was briefly described in our issue for September, 1892, by Mr. Hipkins, in the course of an article on the Vienna Exhibition, where it was exhibited. The date of the play, and most probably, therefore, of the music, is 408 B.C. The right and left sides of the page are torn or worn away, and the middle is much damaged; but portions of six lines of text and seven of musical notation remain. The text, of course, can easily be completed from ordinary editions of the play, and this fact has enabled Mr. Williams to re-construct the rhythm of the whole—conjecturally, indeed, but yet in accordance with principles now well understood by experts. We give the very interesting fragment in question, which, it will be observed, has notes for an instrument at the ends of the verses. In these places it would appear that the player extemporised a short interlude. The small notes do not exist in the papyrus; they are merely given to show the rhythm.



* The doubly underlined notes are a quarter of a tone lower.

The words, freely translated, are: "I bewail, I bewail the blood of thy mother, whose death drives thee to frenzy. Great prosperity does not long endure among mortals, but sinks in the destructive waves of great evil, as the sail of a swift ship which is capsized by a deity, disappears in the waves of ocean."

With regard to the second fragment, which is, musically, much less mutilated, it dates from the first century of our era. The rhythm here given by Mr. Williams was suggested to him by Professor Campbell:

The first line of this melody strongly suggests the Hypo-Lydian mode (key of g with c♯). The pauses on f♯ in the following lines suggest the Dorian (f♯, g, a, b, c♯, d, e, f♯, with b as tonic); but if its last note be regarded as the scale note its mode would be Phrygian.

The growth of impressionist descriptive reporting in connection with politics is constantly leading to new and unexpected developments. The latest of these is especially calculated to appeal to readers of The Musical Times. To be explicit, we read in a morning contemporary of the 20th ult. the following description of the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in introducing the Evicted Tenants Bill: "Mr. Morley's opening speech was a little prosaic, but it was very finely toned. Mr. Morley always reminds one of a fine, if rather thin, piano, perfectly in tune if sometimes wanting in breadth and volume." Now that a lead has been given in this direction, we may confidently look forward to a glut of musical metaphors in the leading articles of the daily press. If Mr. Morley may be seriously compared to a piano, there is nothing to prevent a parliamentary reporter from finding instrumental analogues for every other prominent politician. We remember once reading an account of a speech by a well-known Irish patriot in which the tones of his voice were compared to a railway whistle, but that was but a crude and inartistic simile. How much more interesting and attractive political articles would become if they were embellished with such passages as: "Mr. Balfour, in the most delicate pianissimo, addressed himself con sordino to the details of the measure"; or, "The finale of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, allegro guerriero, was remarkable for his masterly treatment of somewhat unpromising material and the striking staccato accompaniment improvised by the Irish members." And then what opportunities for advertisement will be afforded to enterprising instrument makers by the new criticism! The literature of testimonials would gain a welcome variety from documents couched in such terms as the following: "Lord Rosewood presents his compliments to Messrs. Chicory and Hammerstein and assures them that he has never heard the tones of his voice more accurately imitated than by their Bessemer steel boudoir pianette."

Music has been a good deal in evidence in recent novels. In one of these, entitled "A Daughter of Music," with the ominous motto from Ecclesiastes "The daughters of music shall be brought low," the author lays himself out to illustrate, in the person of his heroine, the evil influence which one mind can exert on another through the medium of modern music in general and Wagner in particular, even without the aid of words or scenic accessories. Then in "The Rubicon," the new novel from the pen of the author of the much-discussed "Dodo," we find the crucial moment of the plot associated with a performance of "Tannhäuser," to which the heroine takes her lover with the deliberate intention of opening his eyes to the necessity of choosing between the Venusberg and the higher life. It is a strong situation, and handled with considerable skill by Mr. Benson. Finally, we have in "Janet Delille" a very lively and amusing piece of satire aimed at the fervid folly of the drawing-room love-song. The author describes a fashionable party, the central figure of which was at the pianoforte "singing one of those love-songs which he composes himself and sings red-hot. He had the usual admiring circle of ladies, at the prettiest one of whom he was directing the song. 'If that girl has any male belonging present,' Mrs. Sutton observed, meeting Janet after she had greeted her hostess, 'he ought to take that man out into Exhibition Road and kick him. At my age one is apt to over-estimate the virtue which prevailed in one's youth, but I can conscientiously state we had the advantage over this generation in not going in for passion in the parlour.'" It gives us great pleasure to quote such a straightforward and wholesome piece of criticism.

There are few topics on which Mr. Ruskin has not, at some time or other, had his say; but his opinions on any one subject are, by the nature of his form of thought, distributed among so many of his works that no small labour is required to find them. On music, which of all the Arts is that with which Mr. Ruskin has least acquaintance technically, he has nevertheless said many things that the greatest musicians would have been proud to father: a proof—were it needed—that the heights of knowledge may, under certain conditions, be reached with very little climbing. We question, for instance, if a better definition of our art than this, from "Fors Clavigera," has yet been given: "The great purpose of Music is to say a thing that you mean deeply, in the strongest and clearest possible way." And what could be better than the following: "The law of nobleness in Music and Poetry is essentially one. Both are the necessary and natural expression of pure and human joy or sorrow, by the lips and fingers of persons trained in the right schools to manage their bodies and souls. Every child should be taught from its youth to govern its voice discreetly and dexterously, as it does its hands; and not to be able to sing should be more disgraceful than not being able to read or write. For it is quite possible to lead a virtuous and happy life without books or ink, but not without wishing to sing when we are happy, nor without meeting with continual occasions when our song, if right, would be a kind service to others."

These, and Mr. Ruskin's other utterances on the subject of music, have been wisely and well collected by Miss A. M. Wakefield, and issued in a little volume, under the title of "Ruskin on Music," which we trust every musician will make haste to add to his library. Miss Wakefield's own comments on the extracts are, themselves, of considerable value—her arrangement of the subject-matter of her volume is quite admirable. She divides it into six chapters—"The Ideal in Music," "Music and Early Influences," "Music and Painting," "Music and Education," "Music and Morals," "Conclusion—Music and Joanna's care"—and, as far as possible, adopts a chronological order. We learn, though without surprise, that in his early years Mr. Ruskin valued music much less than he does now, that in fact he regarded it as little more than "a mere sensual gratification," and placed painting on a much higher level. A little later he says, "I do not mean to depreciate music; let it be loved and reverenced as is just, only let the delight of the eye be reverenced more."

By-and-bye the influence of Plato begins to appear, and we have much enforcing of the Greek philosopher's views—e.g., 'The proper nourishment of the intellect and passions can no more take place without Music than the proper functions of the stomach and the blood without exercise." Eventually we have in "Queen of the Air" one of those superb passages that have long ago placed Mr. Ruskin at the head of English prose-writers. There is, unfortunately, only space for a few lines: "This (music) which of all the Arts is the most ethical in origin, is also the most direct in power of discipline, the first, the simplest, the most effective of all instruments of moral instruction; while in the failure and betrayal of its functions it becomes the subtlest aid of moral degradation. Music is thus in her health the teacher of perfect order, and is the voice of the obedience of angels, and the companion of the course of the spheres of heaven; and in her depravity she is also the teacher of perfect disorder and disobedience, and the 'Gloria in Excelsis' becomes the 'Marseillaise.'" Here is an observation that Burlington House will do well to consider curiously: "It is I believe as certain that in the last twenty years we have learnt to better understand good music, and to love it more, as that in the same time our knowledge and love of pictures have not increased. The reason is easily found. Our music has been chosen for us by masters and our pictures have been chosen by ourselves. If we can imagine exhibitions where good, and bad, and indifferent symphonies, quartets, and songs could be heard [alas! they can.—Ed. M. T.] not more imperfectly than pictures, good, bad, and indifferent are seen at the Academy . . . can we doubt that pretty tunes would be more popular than the finest symphonies of Beethoven or the loveliest songs of Schubert?" [They are!—Ed. M. T.]

A most interesting ceremony was that which had its scene in Westminster Abbey on the morning of the 20th ult., when the Princess Christian, President of the Jenny Lind Memorial Committee, unveiled the fine marble medallion portrait of the famous singer, which had been executed by the late Mr. Birch, R.A. The medallion, which represents Madame Lind-Goldschmidt in profile, does full justice to the striking resoluteness of her features. Round the medallion run the words: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and at the foot there is a laurel-wreathed lyre, and the simple inscription, "Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt. Born Oct. 6, 1820. Died Nov. 2, 1887." No happier spot could have been selected for the memorial than that chosen by Dean Bradley. It is placed on the wall of the South transept, close to the Handel monument, and just over the grave of the great Saxon composer. As the Dean himself has said, it is a site which must commend itself as singularly appropriate for a monument to one who will be long remembered as "the inspiring interpreter to thousands of our countrymen of the great master whose works have so profoundly impressed the nation, among whose honoured dead he was himself laid to rest." Had it not been for the wedding festivities at Coburg, other members of the Royal Family would have been present; but the assemblage was both distinguished and representative. Besides Prince and Princess Christian there were present, amongst others, Sir George Grove, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir Theodore and Lady Martin, Lord Monteagle, the President of the Bach Choir, in which Madame Lind-Goldschmidt took so active an interest; Lord Thring, Lord Charles Bruce, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt with his two sons and daughter. The music performed consisted of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "Lift thine eyes," and, as a graceful compliment to Mr. Goldschmidt, the pastorale and chorale from his cantata "Ruth," played on the organ by Dr. Bridge. We cordially re-echo the sentiments of a writer in the Daily Telegraph, when he says: "It is but meet that the artistic triumphs of so supreme a songstress as Jenny Lind should be permanently commemorated in a country where, during her long and exemplary life, she was no less sincerely honoured than enthusiastically admired."

The May number of the School Music Review gives full statistics of the progress of music in State-aided schools. It appears that last year 3,225,274 children gained the grant for note-singing, and 888,672 for ear-singing. It is gratifying to observe that ear-singing is gradually abolishing itself. In 1891, 2,686,138 children passed in note-singing, and 1,080,513 in ear-singing. A comparison of these figures with those for last year affords striking evidence of the growth of note-singing and the decline of ear-singing. The amount of money paid last year for note-singing was £161,264, and for ear-singing only £22,216. Total, £183,480. These figures are the expenditure of the English and Welsh Department only. The Scotch Department pays in addition about £25,000 for singing grants. So the grand total last year was £210,000. Musicians sometimes cast wistful eyes on the sums paid for music in schools, and speculate upon the vistas such an expenditure on high art would open up. But they must remember that the music grant for schools is simply a form of helping to pay the salaries of school teachers and the general expenses of the schools. If the music grant, as such, were withdrawn, the amount would have to be paid under some other head. We should all be glad, therefore, that a paternal government is so well advised as to permit so much of its inevitable expenditure in elementary education to be devoted to the cultivation of the national ear. The statistics given in the Review show very clearly that the Tonic Sol-fa notation still maintains its popularity in schools of this type. Last year this method was employed in 17,503 schools, as against 16,368 in the preceding year; whereas the Staff notation was used in only 2,413 schools, as against 2,466 in the preceding year—a falling off of fifty-three. Even the Church schools, in which for so long Staff notation held sway, now to the number of 7,888, teach Tonic Sol-fa. For fuller particulars as to these interesting statistics we must refer our readers to the School Music Review itself.

In a recent article in the Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft, Herr Albert Levinsohn discusses the date of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, known as No. 1, and published by Haslinger in 1828 as "Grosse charakteristische Overture, Op. 138." Nottebohm came to the conclusion that this Overture was written, presumably for Prague, between April, 1807, and December, 1808, and that it was written after the "Leonore" Overtures known as Nos. 2 and 3. Schindler, however, in the first edition of his "Beethoven Biography" states, that of the three Overtures it was the first written, and that it was tried over by a small orchestra at Prince Lichnowsky's, but that it was unanimously declared too simple by the friends and connoisseurs present, and consequently was laid aside. The question is not merely a chronological one, but it possesses special musical interest. "Excelsior" was Beethoven's motto, and Herr Levinsohn considers it inconceivable that the master, after rising to the majestic heights of the so-called No. 3, should descend to the comparatively low level of the Op. 138. Herr Levinsohn has Schindler on his side, but, in other matters, this biographer's statements have been seriously called into question. The reasonableness of supposing Op. 138 to be really No. 1 will not suffice in these days of critical research, and Herr Levinsohn, accordingly, seriously discusses Nottebohm's arguments.

INTO the various pros and cons of the discussion it is not our intention here to enter, yet a word or two may be said about the conclusions drawn by Nottebohm from the Beethoven Sketch-books in favour of his statement that the Overture was the third in order of composition. Among musical relics Beethoven's Sketch-books occupy a foremost place. In them we are able to follow many of the master's mightiest works from their first germ, through many workings, down almost to their final form; in no case, either in music or literature, has a better opportunity ever been offered of tracing the ways and workings of genius. In studying these books and in guiding musicians through their labyrinthian leaves, Nottebohm has, indeed, rendered valuable service, and this is acknowledged in the fullest manner by Herr Levinsohn. But the latter reminds us that some of those books are incomplete; that order was not Beethoven's first law, and, consequently, that it is difficult to base any chronological argument on the order of succession of certain sketches; further, that the particular sketches from which Nottebohm draws certain chronological conclusions are not even to be found in Sketch-books, but merely on loose leaves.

To decide which of the two, Nottebohm or Levinsohn, is nearer the truth (the latter, it may be remarked, has gone much into detail, and has given various examples—not connected with the "Leonore" Overture—of Nottebohm "forcing an opinion on his readers, rather than giving them material and ground to form one on their own account") is certainly difficult; but the fact that the matter, as already stated, possesses real musical interest makes one hope that it will be thoroughly sifted. Let Justice prevail though Nottebohm fall!

THE report of the music competitions at Kendal, which we give in another column, should be pondered over by all who value the cultivation of music for the people by the people. A dominant and high-minded personality has transformed a typically dormant country locality into one of the most active centres of healthy musical study to be found in the kingdom. Seven years ago Kendal meekly followed a scheme to awaken musical life in villages. Now it unquestionably takes the lead in undertakings of this kind. A thousand or more individuals have been got to make music for themselves by forming junior, boys, female voice, male voice, and mixed voice choirs, and by studying sight-singing with commendable earnestness. Twenty villages and small towns round Kendal responded this year to Miss Wakefield's beacon call. Sedbergh, Kirkby Stephen, and Crosscrake, all small places, each sent seven choirs to compete in various sections. If rural England is to be made musical, the Wakefield educational and stimulative scheme is one of the indispensable factors of the process. The most inveterate unbeliever in the utility of competitions would hesitate to find fault with the working of the Kendal scheme. All honour to Miss Wakefield and her enthusiastic coadjutors for their persistent belief in the impossible and for their energetic service to the cause of musical art!

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

I AM disappointed in Bournemouth. When news came, not long ago, that the local authorities had engaged a town band at a cost for the season of £4,500 I, to speak in figure, gave three cheers for those wise and spirited conscript fathers. Now my faith in them has received a terrible shock. Before me lies an official document headed "Borough of Bournemouth," and having reference to the proximate appointment of a Town Organist. The particulars supplied to possible candidates for the post are amazing. In the first place, the salary is not to exceed £120 per annum, or £2 6s. 1½d. per week, with a fraction over. Whether that be a fair or unfair remuneration depends upon the duties of the position, and these are stated in the next clause:—

DUTIES.—(a) From May 14th to October 13th.—Organ recital of one hour's duration daily (3 till 4); play piano with small orchestra on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons (4 till 5.30); also on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings; accompany vocalists, &c., at all evening concerts; also give organ solos at evening concerts when required.

(b) From October 15th to January 12th.—Organ recital daily; accompany vocalists at concerts as required (no playing with band); organ solos at evening concerts.

(c) January 14th to May 13th.—Organ recital daily; play with orchestra afternoon and evening, and accompany vocalists; organ solos occasionally if required at concerts.

For £120, therefore, the Bournemouth authorities expect to find a trained musician willing to perform two or three times a day all the year round. I do not wish they may get him. It may be said that the Borough Organist will have certain hours in the day to himself for private lessons, and all his Sundays; but wait a moment. There is another "duty"—namely, "To assist the Musical Director generally in the discharge of his duties." What that may involve is easy to guess. There is yet more to come. The authorities are quite willing to pay less than £120. They invite applications "stating salary required," so that should any organist be willing to enjoy the salubrity of Bournemouth at a smaller cost to the borough, there will be no objection on the part of his employers. The arrangement, as involving the gratification of a special and individual taste, is considerate. Here, surely, is a case for the Incorporated Society of Musicians!

MR. PHILIP HALE, writing in the Musical Courier, gives a strange account of doings at Boston in connection with the performance of a Miracle Play. The orchestra was composed of three street musicians, a violinist, flautist, and harpist, none of whom had previously seen the play; but they, according to the manageress, Miss Algar, "knew they were to give an overture, introduce the scenes with short selections, and play a measure or two of music where they knew there were 'situations.'" The strains chosen to accompany the sacred drama included a waltz, played at the close of the incidents in the Garden of Gethsemane; "Daisy Bell," which accompanied the bargaining of Judas with the priests; "After the Ball," selected for attendance upon a soliloquy spoken by Pilate; and "Then You'll Remember Me," to which the curtain rose upon the trial scene, this being immediately followed by "Old Folks at Home" and selections from "Erminie." "All this," says Mr. Hale, "is too shocking to provoke even a smile." Yet it was a clergyman's daughter who got up the show! Was the performance an illustration of the "Revolt of the Daughters," about which so much present fuss is made?

THE "new criticism," which consists largely in "a nice derangement of epitaphs," seems to have established itself in Yorkshire. In a journal of that county I read, concerning a vocal artist, that "he has learned, and not lost, the art of modulation, the touch of mellowness that lends musical rhythm to the fine old airs of German romance." How a touch of mellowness can lend musical rhythm I cannot conceive, but the words unquestionably sound well. No doubt it was "interesting to watch the audience—how, from tentative curiosity it awoke to a newer and warmer musical comprehension, ending in valiant and repeated cheers." Here is a fine burst: "There can be no question but that it (the singer's voice) is truest to itself and to its timbre in these fierce and frenzied German songs, now rollicking and roaring, now sad and wailing, or hushed to a spectral softness gliding into silence — into Zeitgeist." Beautiful indeed!

A DAILY journal of much ability and high repute in the West of England has just fallen a victim to the impish tricks of the printer's boy, who, in connection with a notice of a Paderewski Recital, strove to excel himself, and that not vainly. After being operated upon by him, Rubinstein came out as "Rubenstein"; consummately as "consumately"; sonata as "sonation"; Allegro con brio ed appassionato as "Allegro con trio ed appassion ato"; Marche Funèbre as "marche Gunébre"; pronounced as "proncunced"; and music as "mutic"! These things are quite in the young gentleman's line; but was it he who made the critic say that Paderewski is "an artist whose gifts are sufficiently great to call for no extraordinary attributes"; that, after an agitato had displayed the artist's ease in an energetic passage, the scherzo called for "but little respite in general attack"; that another piece "opened with a pronounced lento movement in a descriptive minor," and that it had a "brass, harp-like accompaniment"? If the mischievous creature has broken out on this line, we may expect some yet more curious results.

THE musical reporter of a journal not unknown in the County of Herts distinguishes himself much by individuality of expression. In noticing a recent concert he tells us that an overture was "rendered in an artistic regard to light and shade in the more undulated passages, the violin obbligato telling with tender effect." Also, that in the performance of a Psalm "the concluding figure was well taken up by the chorus." Also, that a lady "rendered 'Angels, ever bright and fair' in cheerful mood, but the time was elongated to 'largo' instead of the scored 'allegretto.'" To this it may be added that a singer was "loudly recalled for a splendid rendition," &c.

A CORRESPONDENT insists that the scientific musician can be incoherent as well as the country musical reporter, and calls attention to the following extract from the annotated programme of a recent Organ Recital:

> The introduction in E flat minor, a key rarely employed, has sombre, yet gracefully constructed imitative passages for strings in three-two measure, interrupted several times by piquant sentences in three-four measure, the count beats forming the half-beat of the alternately given sentences in three-two time for wind instruments.

"Let him, who can, construe this," exclaims my correspondent, and then good-humouredly points out that, in the same programme, a certain piece is called "a plaintiff air from Sterndale Bennett."

FROM Cornwall comes an example of a style of Concert-reporting much favoured in another "Far West." I read: "Then came before the audience a woman of fine presence—a blonde, with milk-white teeth, and whose 'throat was like the swan.' The graceful carriage, the splendid throat, and the self confident air awakened the expectation that Miss ——, of the Crystal Palace and London Ballad Concerts, would give them a taste of true melody. But even then they were astonished. The sound of her rich contralto voice rang through the spacious hall like an organ endowed with mouth-speech. . . . She sang as if she was impelled by the same natural force which causes the nightingale, the thrush, the lark, and the canary to send up a gush of music from a well that never runs dry." Of a pianist it is said: "His response to the encore was as delightful an imitation of falling drops of water as one could hear. It recalled the crystal purity of music from the rims of half-filled goblets, under the finger-touch of skilled artistes." The last sentence is magnificent.

PROFESSOR BRIDGE continues to distinguish himself by a happy choice of themes for his Gresham Lectures. The series just concluded began with a discussion of Pelham Humfrey and his music—a subject regarding which the professor must have found it very easy to impart information, because so little is popularly known. There is a disposition to treat our old church composers as mere Dry-as-dusts, whereas they are, when looked at closely, very interesting men, full of ability, and attractive to many more than students of antiquarian tastes. The second and third Lectures were entitled "On the road to the String Quartet"—a most fruitful field of research, if I may call a road a field; and the last was devoted to Mace's "Musick's Monument," which, by the way, is Mace's Monument also. It is to be hoped that Dr. Bridge will soon begin to arrange his lectures for publication. They would have a large sale.

THE following advertisement recently appeared in the Church Times: "To the Clergy and Others.—Situation wanted as Organist, Groom, and Gardener. Excellent references. Apply," &c. Sending this to me, a correspondent drily remarks: "Truly, this is the age of combination!"

A WELL-KNOWN artist writes to me in illustration of the power of music to exert such charm as that which David's harp brought to bear upon Saul. She cites the case of a lady, daughter of a Church dignitary, "who, in her lucid moments, is strong on religion, and, when possessed, swears like a costermonger." This unfortunate person has been repeatedly brought under the influence of music by being taken to the Recitals given by my correspondent, and the result appears in a gratifying amelioration of her state. On the morning after the last of the performances, the artist received a short poem, in blank verse, from the patient. I quote a few lines from this effusion of gratitude:—

God's blessing on the gifted one who brings
Such tender memories again to bloom
Within the treasured garden of the mind
By her celestial touch. Oh, may she reap
Such joy as she unto her listeners gives;
And may the hands that reproduce the thoughts
Of master minds in music's corridors
Embrace, one day, the angel's harp of gold.

It is not often that an artist receives a more pathetic tribute.

FROM a correspondent:

Sir W. Harcourt must have a very remarkable vocal compass, equal probably to that of Giulia Ravogli and Santley combined. So at least we infer from a notice of a brief speech made by him the other day in the House of Commons. The notice occurs in Black and White, March 24, and ends thus: "Before he had done his voice had sunk many octaves."

ON the subject of improving musical criticisms supplied to country papers, a correspondent writes:

Surely it is time that something was done to give us competent musical critics in the country. Could not editors place such work in the hands of musicians of recognised standing—men who would not be ashamed to append their names to their criticisms? A small fee for each criticism would to a certain extent repay the critic for his trouble and loss of time, and at the same time give the editor at all events some control over his contributor.

This seems to me a good suggestion.

ONLY two of Wagner's works were performed during the recent opera season in Chicago. Sir Augustus Harris leaves the master's later music severely alone this year. The forthcoming performances at Bayreuth are to be the last for some time. Does the world demand breathing space?

A LEADING musical paper in America asserts that Gilbert and Sullivan's "Utopia" is "not absolutely without merit."

HERE is an American appreciation of Mr. Ben Davies:—

He is not the usual cut-and-dried regulation oratorio tenor, for he is not choked by tradition, nor is he afraid to show his feelings. Oratorio singing is, as a rule, the most frigid thing in the world. So when this English artist, in "St. Paul," began his "Men, Brethren, and Fathers," it was something quite out of the ordinary we got. Suavity of tone there was, exquisite verbal discrimination, and lots of fire and feeling.

Behold another feather in the cap of "gallant little Wales."

JOSEPH BENNETT.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE Albert Hall is so very seldom the scene of the production of a new choral work of the first magnitude that the performance on the 12th ult. may be regarded as a specially interesting event in the history of the immense building at Kensington Gore. The opportunity afforded to the Royal Choral Society of presenting such an important contribution to the sacred music of the present generation as Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem" does not often occur, and the executive of the Royal Choral Society were wise to secure it without delay. The reason why the work is described as a "Mystery" and not as an Oratorio is well set forth in the preface to the score. "The term 'Mystery,' in its special and ancient application to religious drama, is here used because it more clearly indicates the nature of the work than would the wider designation 'Oratorio.'" It is further said that "Some authority for the descriptive passages, such as the words of the opening chorus, may be discovered in the fact that certain of the ancient Mysteries had a part for an Expositor who supplemented the action of the drama. The introduction of such passages is believed to be advantageous from a musical point of view." Here of course is matter for controversy; but impartial enquirers will be of opinion that if those old masters who wrote settings of the Passion of Our Lord, among whom J. S. Bach of course occupies the foremost place, and such a modern of the moderns as the late Charles Gounod could frame a work so brilliantly successful as "The Redemption," on similar lines, Messrs. Joseph Bennett and A. C. Mackenzie were more than justified in avoiding the conventional methods of oratorio, and adopting a judicious mixture of the antique and the modern. Perhaps of more interest to conductors of choral societies is the fact that each of the two acts or parts is complete in itself, and adapted for separate performance. This is a matter of considerable importance. Lengthy oratorio is in some quarters regarded as out of fashion at the present time, but sacred cantatas of moderate length were never more in vogue; and here we have two works, or rather one work easily separable into two, neither losing aught by the division. As "Bethlehem" was lengthily analysed in the March number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, detailed description of its form is not further required; but special attention should be drawn to the singular appropriateness of Dr. Mackenzie's setting of every line of the book and to the versatility of his style. We recognise the hand that penned "Jason," "The Rose of Sharon," and "The Dream of Jubal" constantly, it is true; but on the substratum of his own individuality, so to speak, the composer has managed to engraft features as varied as it is possible to conceive. For example, the massive Finale, "Uplift a song of praise," the Virgin Mother's exquisite Cradle Song, and the Oriental March heralding the approach of the Wise Men, are all in the sharpest contrast, and yet there is no sense of labour or of aiming at effect at the cost of inspiration. Above the whole there is the evidence of consummate musicianship, equalled perhaps by other composers of the present day, but certainly not surpassed. With regard to the character of his thematic material, Dr. Mackenzie has of course kept in view the naïveté of the form suggested by the author. Simplicity, directness, sincerity, breadth, and, at times, a certain ruggedness distinguish this portion of the work in an unusual degree, and though the treatment is modern as regards harmony and orchestration, it is by no means complex, in the sense that many works of the present day are rightly said to be. The gifts which enable a composer to be simple and tuneful, not only without sacrifice of dignity, but with results often remarkable for power and elevation—qualities that are among the rarest to be found in modern sacred music—are not to be lightly estimated, and we question whether the merits of "Bethlehem" in these respects have yet been adequately recognised. But there is plenty of time. "Bethlehem," like many another masterpiece, may not at once attain its rightful position; but it can afford to wait. Full appreciation is bound to come sooner or later. With respect to the Albert Hall performance, there is ample room for praise, and none whatever for blame. Concerning the efforts of the principal vocalists, it will suffice to say that full justice was rendered to their respective parts by Miss Ella Russell, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Arthur Barlow, and Mr. David Bispham, and that special gratitude is due to Mr. Barton McGuckin for having taken the tenor part at a few hours' notice in place of Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was incapacitated by illness from fulfilling his engagement. In consequence of the indefatigable efforts of Sir Joseph Barnby the celebrated choir had thoroughly mastered its duties, and the composer, who conducted, must have been well satisfied with the interpretation of his work and with its reception by a large audience.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This Society came out, at the third Concert of its present season (the 19th ult.), with a programme much shorter than usual. A la bonne heure! The directors have been too liberal, and have gone very near satiating audiences instead of sending them away with a feeling that they could have endured a little—just a little—more. We trust the Philharmonic "new model" will not be abandoned. It is altogether an improvement.

The more or less familiar works played at this Concert were Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Berlioz's Overture to "King Lear," and Beethoven's Symphony in B flat. It will suffice, as regards the two last-named, that Dr. Mackenzie conducted a remarkably fine performance, the gloom and passion of the tragic Overture being as well expressed as the cheerfulness and humour of Beethoven's most light-hearted Symphony. The Scottish musician appears now quite settled down into his Philharmonic seat, and is showing himself the right man in the right place. Mr. Sapellnikoff was the soloist in Schumann's work, and, after having had a very cordial reception, so acquitted himself as to win an "ovation," to say nothing of an encore. In our opinion, nevertheless, the Russian pianist is not a model interpreter of Schumann. Such an one effaces himself that the master may be all in all, but Mr. Sapellnikoff has, in his artistic nature, too great a strain of the virtuoso. We need not insist that he played brilliantly and with astonishing technique. It was this that the audience applauded, we imagine, rather than faithfulness to the spirit and intentions of the composer.

The novelty in the programme was Dr. Hubert Parry's Overture "To an Unfinished Tragedy," which, however, can be styled a novelty only in relation to a London audience, the work having been produced at the Worcester Festival last year. It was noticed by our special correspondent at the time, and we shall not enter upon the superfluous task of discussing it again after so brief an interval. Enough if we say that the Overture, though its applied meaning be but vaguely indicated, is suggestive in a marked degree; that the details of its construction are ingenious, and that every part of it is invested with that quality of distinction which only a master can give. While not the greatest of Dr. Parry's works for the orchestra, it is great in many respects. The popular composer was called to the platform and much applauded. In the absence of Miss Sherwin through illness, Miss Ella Russell did good service as vocalist.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Of Mr. Henschel's eighth season it may be said, "the end crowned the work." The eighth and last Concert, which took place on the 5th ult., consisted entirely of works by Beethoven—the magic of whose name sufficed to fill every nook and cranny of St. James's Hall. The scheme included the wonderfully eloquent, tragic, and poetic Overture, "Coriolanus"; the Pianoforte Concerto in G, played with great charm and taste by Mr. Borwick; "Adelaida," the divine purity of which was matched by that of its rendering by Mr. Edward Lloyd; and the Choral Symphony. The last of the "immortal nine," once so "incomprehensible" even to the elect, is now almost as familiar and as well understood as the C minor, the "Eroica," or the A major—thanks to the perseverance of our leading conductors; and each new rendering of it finds hosts of intelligent and critical listeners. Those present on this occasion were constrained to admit that a better performance had rarely, if ever, been heard. The tender beauties of the Adagio, in particular, were dealt with by the orchestra in quite exemplary fashion, the phrasing of the violins being remarkable for its freedom and grace; and the performances of the other movements gave few opportunities for adverse comment. The hypercritical wondered a little at the speed of the Trio, but that was all. The vocal soloists, Miss Fillunger, Miss Agnes Jansen, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Daniel Price, gave an almost faultless rendering of the difficult music allotted to them; and the choral portions were delivered with a spirit, an intelligence, and an amount of general efficiency that merit the highest praise. The applause which brought the Conductor to the platform at the close of an arduous task gave plain indication of the gratitude of his audience. Mr. Henschel's reputation has now reached so high a point that the difficulty of living up to it will be no small matter. But he is not of the stuff to be daunted by difficulties.

HERR MOTTL'S CONCERT.

The famous Conductor, Herr Mottl, made his first appearance in England at Queen's Hall, on the 17th ult., at a Wagner Concert, organised by Mr. Schulz-Curtius. The great room was filled in every part by a highly attentive and appreciative audience, which gave signs of its satisfaction in the most emphatic manner at the close of each piece. The works chosen were chronologically arranged, and included the Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhäuser"; the Preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal"; the "Liebestod," the Trauermarsch, and Wotan's "Abschied"—this last sung most artistically by Mr. Andrew Black. An orchestra of exceptional strength and excellence had been engaged—with extra brass for the realization of the composer's intentions in the Funeral March—and, save that the first violins were scarcely powerful enough, admirable results were obtained. Wagner's works are now so familiar that two rehearsals enabled Herr Mottl to come to a perfect understanding with his band, and his slightest indications were consequently obeyed with a promptness that could scarcely have been exceeded if months instead of hours had been spent in preparation. This, in itself, shows Herr Mottl to be a born ruler of men. His "readings" were marked by singular clearness, delicacy, and energy, great rhythmic freedom, and exceptionally strong contrasts of all kinds. Not a detail, not a point was lost, and altogether it was felt by those who made first acquaintance with the Carlsruhe Conductor that his fame was well deserved. At the same time we seemed to miss, on two or three occasions—in the "Liebestod," for instance, in Wotan's "Abschied," and in certain parts of the "Meistersinger" Prelude—a certain glow of ecstasy, an emportement, a rapture, that are never lacking in the performances of a Conductor whose pupil Herr Mottl is known to be. If he can catch this superfine quality he will have little to fear from any rival.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Mr. Robert Newman, the energetic manager of the new Queen's Hall, has organised some Saturday afternoon choral and orchestral performances, under the conductorship of Mr. F. H. Cowen, the first of which took place on the 21st ult. Sir Arthur Sullivan's ever-welcome cantata "The Golden Legend" was the work performed, and a better selection could not have been made. Interest undoubtedly centred in the efforts of the newly-formed choir, and, on the whole, the force may be said to have acquitted itself extremely well. The intonation at first was a little uncertain, and the words, especially the final consonants, were not spoken as clearly as could be wished. But there is admirable material to work upon, and with proper training the Queen's Hall choir should take a place among the foremost in London. One feature in the performance should not be overlooked. In the brief unaccompanied section "O pure in heart," the pedal notes of the organ were employed, with what authority we know not, but certainly to the injury of this exquisite little piece. The principal parts were all in good hands. If not an ideal exponent of the rôle of Elsie, Miss Ella Russell sang with much intelligence; Miss Greta Williams was conscientious and efficient as Ursula, Mr. Lloyd as usual unsurpassable as Prince Henry, and Mr. Watkin Mills sufficiently cynical in manner as well as vocally excellent in the part of Lucifer. A word of praise is due to Mr. John Sandbrook for his rendering of the small part of the Forester.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

At the Concert of the 7th ult. Mr. Manns introduced a new ballad for chorus and orchestra, "The Wreck of the Hesperus," by Mr. Ferdinand Dunkley. Mr. Dunkley, who is an ex-scholar of the Royal College of Music, where he studied composition under Dr. Hubert Parry, has, since last autumn, been resident at Albany, U.S.A., where he holds a professorship of music and is organist of one of the principal churches. His "Rustic Suite," we may add, gained the fifty-guinea prize offered in an open competition a couple of years ago. The ballad, which is for chorus and orchestra, without solos, is a courageous rather than a wholly successful attempt to grapple with the difficulties imposed by the choice of form in dealing with a poem in which narrative is interspersed with dialogue. Vigour, rather than originality, is the most noteworthy feature in Mr. Dunkley's composition, which is not lacking in sonority or picturesque touches, but fails in those passages of Longfellow's poem where one looks for tenderness and beauty in the musical setting. Mr. Manns secured a very good rendering of the new work, which was accorded a friendly reception, and informed the audience that he would communicate their favourable verdict without delay to the composer in America. The pièce de résistance of the Concert was Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which had been given only two days previously at Mr. Henschel's last Symphony Concert. This immortal work, which had already been performed twenty-five times under Mr. Manns's direction at the Palace, was rendered on this occasion with great spirit and efficiency, the Scherzo in particular going magnificently. The Crystal Palace Choir gave a highly creditable account of itself in the Finale, Miss Fillunger and Mr. Andrew Black especially distinguishing themselves amongst the solo quartet. The programme, which opened with a fine performance of Beethoven's noble "Coriolan" Overture, included songs from the four artists engaged for the Symphony. Miss Fillunger gave an admirable rendering of the beautiful aria "Ach, ich fuhl's," from the "Zauberflöte," but none of the others were really satisfactory. Mr. Andrew Black sang "Non più andrai" with spirit rather than humour, but his Italian accent is deplorable; while Mr. Piercy's reading of "Adelaida," by turns studiously repressed and unnecessarily emphatic, left a great deal to be desired in regard of phrasing and sentiment. Miss Annie Layton essayed "Chè faro" with only moderate success.

M. Sapellnikoff being unable to obtain leave of absence to fulfil his engagement on the 14th ult., the directors instructed Mr. Manns to organise a Wagner Concert for that date. The instrumental selections comprised the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Entry of the Gods into Walhall from "Rheingold," the Prelude and orchestral version of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," the Trauermarsch from "Götterdämmerung," and the Walkürenritt from "Die Walküre." These were all played in highly creditable fashion, "The Flying Dutchman" Overture, the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the "Tristan" selection being in particular remarkable for the emotional and poetic quality of Mr. Manns's readings. Mr. Andrew Black declaimed Vanderdecken's first aria, "The term's expired," and "Pogner's Address" in his best style, and Madame Clara Samuell contributed, with great refinement, two of the songs written by Wagner during his stay in Paris in 1839.

The concluding Concert of the series was held on the 21st ult., with Madame Sophie Menter as the instrumental soloist. Her rendering of Liszt's Concerto in E flat (No. 1) was marked by a good deal of her old power and technical dexterity, qualities which were displayed later on in the afternoon in Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Erl-King." Dr. Mackenzie's singularly clever and interesting "Twelfth Night" Overture—a work which gains greatly on further acquaintance—opened the programme, which also included Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture, both played with immense spirit by the orchestra. The vocalist, Miss Hudleston, showed a distinct advance on her previous efforts by her excellent singing of "Deh vieni" ("Le Nozze di Figaro") and Goring Thomas's romantic song "A Memory."

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Professor Bridge's explanation of his ingenious "Musical Gestures," on the 19th ult., at the Royal Institution, excited an amount of interest fully equal to that evinced in his discourses on the subject at Gresham College and the Royal Academy of Music. The simplicity and many unique advantages of this method of learning the rudiments of music make it peculiarly acceptable to this utilitarian age, and there can be little doubt the system set forth in Novello's Primer will be widely adopted. It is also evident that the method is capable of development, Professor Bridge himself adding on the occasion in question several suggestive and helpful gestures. Amongst such was what was called a "living chord," the boys stepping out the intervals of the common chord while singing in such manner that when the chord was completed they stood in couples in advance of each other at distances corresponding to the position of the notes of the chord. Other harmonic combinations could evidently be practised, their number apparently being only limited by the ingenuity of the teacher. The gestures were executed with military-like smartness by twelve of the Westminster choirboys, with whom the exercises seem decidedly popular.

MR. DOLMETSCH'S RECITALS.

Having set forth the merits and beauties of the music of our forefathers, Mr. Dolmetsch began, on the 10th ult., at his house "Dowland," a series of Concerts illustrative of the music of Continental musicians, commencing with those of Italy. The programme opened with three quaint dance tunes, published in 1581 by Fabritio Caroso, written for the lute and viol, a peculiarity of which being that the melody was in the lowest part—a highly respectable precedent for the practice pursued by certain writers of modern waltzes, whose melodies seem to complainingly ask, "Why should I growl down here in the bass?" Another interesting piece was a Canzona, published in 1637 by Girolamo Frescobaldi. This is written in four sections, the same air being used with modifications in each. A "Follia" for the violin and harpsichord, by Corelli, dated 1700, proved to be an ancient Spanish air with twenty-four variations. Three pieces for the harpsichord, by Domenico Scarlatti, included the one which, from the disjointed character of its theme, is said to have been suggested by a cat walking along the keyboard of the instrument. The composition would seem to point the moral that composers should avoid such sources of inspiration. The Concert ended with the performance of a Concerto for viola d'amore and lute, accompanied by muted violins and organ, by Antonio Vivaldi, a work of considerable interest, and, according to Mr. Dolmetsch, the only Concerto in which the lute was known to have been introduced.

TRINITY COLLEGE.

The Orchestral Concert given on the 2nd ult., in Princes' Hall, by the students of Trinity College, was attended by a large audience that evinced great interest in the performances of the young executants. The most promising of these were Miss Annie Smith and Miss M. Clapton, who have acquired considerable technical command over the pianoforte; Miss F. Brotherhood, who showed artistic intuition by her interpretation of the solo part of two movements from De Beriot's seventh Concerto for violin and orchestra; and Mr. S. Faulks, a young violinist possessing remarkable executive facility. Miss B. Ackworth, Miss J. Bridges, and Mr. Attersoll sang with much acceptance; and Mr. Corder did his best in Bennett's "Parisina" Overture and Grieg's second and third Norwegian Dances to preserve that unity which, in an orchestra, is strength, and something more. Mr. A. W. Ketelbey rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

During the past month a series of three Lectures on "The Science of Musical Intervals" were given by Dr. W. Pole in the College Hall. The lecturer confined his remarks to the explanation of the general principles upon which music has been constructed, from the time of Pythagoras until to-day. The experiments of the ancient philosopher and the peculiarities of the Greek modes were described, and the development of our diatonic scale briefly traced. Helmholtz and the usual authorities were quoted, and if what was said partook of the nature of a "twice told tale," it was put forward with accuracy and lucidity; and, to judge by the large attendances and the attention with which the lectures were followed, was not only acceptable, but helpful to many as a clear exposition of well-established facts.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. Louis N. Parker's paper dealing with "Music in our Public Schools," read on the 10th ult. before the Musical Association, drew a graphic picture of the difficulties which the music-master in such institutions has to encounter, and also provided much material worthy of consideration. Mr. Parker worked with remarkable success at Sherborne School for nineteen years, during which time he raised the musical position of the school to one of the first in the kingdom, and the relation of his experiences and methods are of especial interest at this period, when the art of teaching music is occupying so much attention. One of the most important points insisted upon by Mr. Parker is, that the great object of every public master should be by all and every means to inspire the boys with a love of music in general. His ideal music-master is one who gives his pupils, by practical experience, sufficient knowledge of the art to enable them to understand any music they may hear in later life; who teaches them the difference between good and bad music, and who always remembers that he is not training future professors, but future audiences. The centre of musical life should be the school musical society, through which every boy should pass during some period of his school life, whether he had any aptitude for music or no. "Music is an art in which an ounce of performance is worth a ton of listening, and a boy who has sung a part in the great oratorios has an intimate knowledge of them and acquires an affection for them which no amount of listening might give him." With the object of cultivating healthy taste and giving wide knowledge, choral and orchestral masterpieces of various schools should be chosen for practice, and irrespective of the probabilities of adequate performances. As far as possible outside help at the school concerts should be avoided. The chief difficulties were the influence of the home, where apparently no effort was made to foster musical taste; the neglect of the art at preparatory schools, want of time for practice, and non-musical head-masters. With regard to the first, the lecturer said "to the musician nothing is more pathetic than to find that a nice clean cherub-faced youngster, hailing from the wilds of Scotland or Wales, the possessor, perchance, of an angelic voice, knows nothing of 'Auld Lang Syne' or 'The March of the Men of Harlech,' but can howl the latest London music-hall vulgarity in a sort of bucolic imitation of the London performer. He has been brought up in a refined home, has learned all the sweetest counsels of life at his mother's knees, but just in this one unfortunate art of ours he is no better than a heathen slum-child." The only way the difficulty of want of time could be met was by "watchful sinuousness"; the master must give his lessons whenever and wherever opportunity occurred; and the only hope of success with a non-musical head-master was unwearied patience. Competitions in glee singing were commendable, but competitive solo-singing was to be deprecated. School songs were productive of patriotic love for the school, but they had no influence on the cultivation of good taste. The work of a public school music-master was unceasing drudgery, and offered no opportunities for the satisfaction of personal ambition or for the exercise of the creative faculties; but five years' drilling in such a position would turn out a musician capable of holding any responsible post, and would prove a very enjoyable time to an earnest, conscientious man of robust health and enthusiastic temperament. The paper was followed by a lengthy discussion, in which the chairman, Mr. Ridley Prentice, and an unusual number of members took part.

BRISTOL ORPHEUS SOCIETY.

Carrying out the programme of their jubilee season, the members of this Society came to London on the 7th ult., and gave a performance of glees, &c., in St. James's Hall. We regret to say that the attendance, if not quite precisely described as small, cannot truly be called large. It demonstrated the continued indifference of Londoners to unaccompanied vocal music, and especially to that form of it which the "Orpheus" most cultivate. Yet we may go wrong in supposing that the taste for glees, once so pronounced and prevalent in this country, has died out. The fact may be that it has simply languished for want of stimulus, and is capable of reviving again under proper conditions. But how to establish such conditions? Music of the class now referred to is most exacting. Its execution must be polished to the last degree; made absolutely certain by complete individual as well as collective merit. Great patience and infinite pains are the cost of good unaccompanied part-singing, and in an age of hurry and cheap effects it is scarcely surprising that few are content to pay the price. Among those few the Bristol Orpheus Society holds an honoured place. For that matter, indeed, it may be questioned whether their superiors could be found the whole kingdom over. What such a statement involves amateurs well know. It means not only great ability in the Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, and much good fortune in the discovery and possession of exceptional voices, but also the existence of those precious qualities, enthusiasm and perseverance, lack of which is the bane of musical societies.

The programme of the 7th ult. contained a certain number of pieces chosen from those which obtained most favour at a previous visit of the Society in 1890. For the rest, there were selections from the most admired of our older glee composers, such as Stephens, Horsley, Walmisley, S. S. Wesley, &c. These examples were, of course, heard with interest and enjoyed in proportion to the rarity of opportunities for listening to them. But living composers had a good share of notice. Mr. Cummings, Mr. Lee Williams, and Dr. Bridge each conducted a work of his own, grave or gay, with all the good results he could have wished; and the compositions of Messrs. W. Davies and C. Macpherson, which had gained prizes in connection with the Society's jubilee, were very properly performed. The singing kept on a very high level almost throughout, dropping only in the execution of Wesley's difficult piece, "When fierce conflicting passions." In quality of tone, unanimity of expression, and technical merit, the Bristol glee-men once more asserted a supremacy which only a choir made perfect can hope to wrest from them.

THE "WAKEFIELD" MUSIC COMPETITION AT KENDAL.

For some years past The Musical Times has noticed with ever-increasing approval the progress of the annual music competitions held at Kendal. It is, indeed, impossible to be other than enthusiastic over an institution that seems so entirely wholesome in its results. Concerning itself chiefly with choral singing, the branch of art in which England has been pre-eminent from Elizabethan times, and restricted in its operations to towns and villages of under 6,000 inhabitants in the County of Westmorland, it is difficult to exaggerate the influence of the "Wakefield Music Competitions" on the music of the district. In the programme of the eighth meeting, which took place on the 11th and 12th ult., at least one marked improvement was noticeable. It has been observed that the weak point of the Welsh Eisteddfods was that the amount of time devoted to the preparation of pieces set as tests tended to hinder the cultivation of sight reading and general musicianship. This well-found objection has been met, in the case of the Kendal competition, by associating more closely than in previous years a sight reading test with the singing of the set pieces. Thus, it was a condition of the "Village Choral Society or Choir competition," that "all choirs entering in this class must sing a short exercise in four-part sight reading, of about the difficulty of an easy hymn-tune, immediately after the test piece. Marks for proficiency in this point will count towards the prizes, but prizes will also be given for the sight reading alone." It is worth while to lay some stress upon this particular competition, since it appears to us to be the most important and the most worthy of imitation in other counties. The results were most satisfactory, and spoke eloquently of the continuous and careful cultivation of vocal music in the district during the past decade. Choirs of between sixteen and forty voices came from nine villages or small towns to compete. The test piece, Purcell's chorus "With drooping wings," was one of exceptional difficulty, the reverse of showy, and requiring considerable power of dramatic expression. Its performance was generally characterised by marked intelligence and care, and the pluck with which the sight reading exercises were attacked was perhaps the most promising thing of the whole Festival. Another competition deserving especial notice, both for its novelty and for its practical utility, was in Psalm-chanting. The 137th Psalm, chosen by the judges from three selected Psalms, was sung antiphonally by five bonâ-fide church or chapel choirs, unaccompanied and unconducted. It is not going too far to affirm that the Psalm singing of Westmorland will benefit by this very sensible competition. The string quartet competition initiated last year has gathered strength, five quartet parties, an increase of two over the former competition, entering for it and playing the Adagio and Minuet from Mozart's Quartet in G (Köchel, No. 156) very creditably. It might perhaps be possible on a future occasion to choose a more interesting piece than this early work, written when the composer was but sixteen years of age; but of course the difficulty of selecting music not too long nor too difficult, yet affording an adequate test, must be considerable. It is not to be expected that the result of this competition will be to make finished performers; but it will have accomplished a sufficiently desirable end if it fosters a taste for a class of music too refined and too little sensational or sensuous ever to become very popular.

The remaining competitions followed the lines of former years, and may be quite briefly chronicled. Taking the choir competitions first, as of greater moment than the soloists' contests, thirteen female-voice choirs sang Horsley's "See the chariot at hand," and twelve male-voice choirs were heard in Mr. Arthur Somervell's part-song "The winter it is past," written specially for the occasion. The madrigal competition had for its subject Gibbons's famous "Silver Swan," and furnished some excellent performances, the Windermere choir, which won, being remarkable for both breadth and finish. The junior choir competitions (for children under sixteen) were divided into two classes, one being for boys only, with which was incorporated a sight reading test. The two remaining choral competitions were for choirs that had never before competed at these Festivals, and for certain small villages in a specific list. The "Novello" prize, for the choir receiving the largest aggregate of marks in all classes, went to Sedbergh. There were the usual solo competitions for sopranos, contraltos, soprano and contralto duets, tenors, and basses. It was a curious fact that almost the only competitor in the first of these divisions who seemed really to grasp the playful character of Arne's "Where the Bee sucks" was a small boy, who deservedly won the first prize. An absence of poetry in the various readings was, indeed, their chief fault. "Arm, arm, ye brave," was a hard nut to crack, but this did not deter fifteen basses from trying their skill. Though the Handelian divisions proved rather beyond the powers of vocalisation of nearly all the competitors, the performances were remarkably good, and the winner not only gained the prize, but secured a special prize for enunciation and expression, offered to all who entered as soloists. The sight reading competitions for individuals were of great interest. The first prize in the juvenile section was won by a boy of seven, rather small for his age, whose proficiency in Sol-faing was extraordinary. His brother won the second prize, which seems to argue a hereditary gift. The judges, Messrs. W. G. McNaught, Arthur Somervell, and Luard Selby, not only judged wisely, but added to the value of their judgments by giving, in most instances, the grounds of their decisions.

It may be interesting to add that no fewer than 1,000 individual competitors presented themselves, the highest number yet recorded. The Festival ended with a Concert, at which the combined choirs sang Mendelssohn's 95th and 22nd Psalms, and other works, under Miss Wakefield's very able and vigorous conductorship. Mrs. Mary Davies, Miss Wakefield, and Mr. Masters were the principal vocalists. The crowded audiences on both days indicated the general interest excited by these Festivals.

REMINISCENCES OF SIR ROBERT PRESCOTT STEWART.

The musical world has suffered a severe loss in the sudden death of Sir R. P. Stewart, who for more than thirty-two years has filled the Professorship of Music in the University of Dublin.

Like so many eminent musicians, his genius was a precocious one, displaying itself in his twelfth year by efforts to compose and, in his fourteenth, by his name being placed third in a competition for a prize anthem offered by the Society of Ancient Concerts in Dublin—when Dr. Walmisley of Cambridge took the first place, Dr. John Smith, the Professor of Music in the Dublin University, being second.

Stewart at sixteen was made deputy-organist of Christ Church Cathedral; and two years later succeeded Mr. John Robinson as organist, being also nominated by the Provost and Fellows to fill a similar post, which had been held also by that gentleman, in Trinity College Chapel. Two years later he succeeded Mr. T. White as organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, being at the time barely twenty-one; and he not only retained these offices, but fulfilled all the duties incident to them with unabated zeal and acknowledged distinction for forty-four years.

The history of organ-playing in this century affords but few parallels to such an early development and such mature and long-continued exercise of executive talent. Dr. Walmisley, who was organist of the College chapels both of Trinity and St. John's, Cambridge, presents a similar type of precocity, but his professional career was terminated at the age of fifty-two. The life of Dr. S. S. Wesley, who obtained his first post as organist at the age of seventeen and continued working till his death in 1876, at the age of sixty-six, is a record which more closely resembles that of the Dublin professor.

Stewart's organ playing was notable for its perfect ease and spontaneity. He very early mastered the technique of the instrument, so that the greatest difficulties were really to him as "child's play." His method of accompanying was peculiarly graceful and facile, and in the purest taste. In florid anthems, such as Travers's "Ascribe unto the Lord" (96th Psalm), or in Wesley's "Wilderness," the runs and ornate passages streamed forth with a delicacy and expressiveness which the writer has never heard equalled.

His coolness and collectedness in playing the service were remarkable. Nothing put him out, though he was never alone. Dr. Waller—a true poet, of whom Dublin is justly proud, and who wrote many admirable libretti for his friend—was constantly his attendant; and, with a few others (including the writer when possible), followed him from the College Chapel to the two Cathedrals on almost every Sunday. We plied him with questions, asked his opinion of our own attempts, got him to write or alter chants, which he would pencil with his right hand, his left using the manuals and his feet putting in the bass part. He was perfectly master of himself and of his work, and never by any chance made a mistake. He was very great at improvising; and many a time have we asked him whose was that voluntary he had just played, and he would answer, "Oh! anybody's you please," when he had "knocked off" some grand piece of work which a famous composer might have owned.

In 1845 Stewart, at the age of twenty, succeeded the doyen of Dublin musical professors—Mr. Joseph Robinson—as Conductor of the University Choral Society. That gentleman's words, in introducing him to the post which he filled with distinguished success for nearly half-a-century, are still in the recollection of some of the septuagenarians of the Society: "Gentlemen, I commend to your acceptance as your new Conductor my young friend, who is already the organist of this University. He is the most accomplished musician in Ireland, and I will add, not excepting myself."

We have not space to notice at length Stewart's musical compositions; but his beautiful chants and Church services were amongst the best of his writings. His "Ode to Industry" for the opening of the Cork Exhibition in 1852; his music for the Dublin Exhibition in 1853, and that composed for the great Peace gathering at Boston, U.S.A., in 1872, were all admirable examples of his talent. Then there were his cantatas "Eve of St. John" and "A Winter Night's wake," together with his many delightful glees and part-songs; and perhaps, chief of all, his last important work, the music to the "Tercentenary Ode," performed in Dublin in 1892, all of which will long keep his memory alive.

Sir R. P. Stewart is unquestionably one of the greatest musicians that Ireland has produced in the century. Possibly had he been less insular in his extreme love of home and his dislike of travel, his facility in composition might have been strengthened and deepened by visiting the principal music-centres of Europe, as well as by intercourse with the great musicians of the day. It was not till the Great Exhibition of 1851 afforded an opportunity and an inducement sufficient to overcome for a time the love of his island home and its duties that he crossed the Channel; and there are many of his English fellow-artists who remember his performance on the great organ in Paxton's glass palace, more especially his masterly rendering of Bach's great pedal Fugue in C.

He was also heard, and excited great admiration, when he visited the Manchester Exhibition six years later. Subsequently he extended his travels to the Continent, and made acquaintance with many of the noted organists in France, Germany, and Switzerland.

But Robert Stewart's heart was ever in his native country, and the organ lofts of Trinity College Chapel and of the Cathedrals of Christ Church and St. Patrick's were his triple thrones. The writer made his acquaintance on entering college in 1847, and almost immediately became one of his most fervent admirers and his attached pupil; and he had the happiness of being admitted to a close personal intimacy with one of the most gifted, genial, and lovable of men. He may perhaps be permitted to range himself amongst the bonis, when quoting Horace's lines, never more applicable than to Robert Prescott Stewart—now so suddenly snatched from all who loved and valued him: "Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit."

O. J. V.

THE Royal Academy of Music announces its intention to celebrate the attainment of its seventieth year of life by a Concert, on the afternoon of the 10th inst., at the Queen's Hall. As meet on such an occasion, the artists will be selected from those whom it has trained in the way they have gone with so much success. At present the list includes Mrs. Mary Davies, Mrs. Clara Samuell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. Arthur Oswald, and Mr. John Radcliffe. Another feature of the Concert will be that all the music will be selected from the works of celebrated past students. The programme will thus form a pleasing and most satisfactory proof of the good work the Institution has accomplished since the first lesson was given within its walls, on March 24, 1823.

SIR AUGUSTUS HARRIS has concluded negotiations with Messrs. Ricordi for the production of Verdi's "Falstaff" at his forthcoming season at Covent Garden. The work is to be given by a company specially selected by Messrs. Ricordi. The other novelties announced for performance during the season are Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," Massenet's "La Navarraise," Bruneau's "L'Attaque du Moulin," Gounod's "Sappho," the stage version of Berlioz's "Faust," and Mr. Cowen's "Signa."

WE understand that during the stay of Her Majesty the Queen at the Villa Fabbricotti, Florence, Signor Buonamici had the honour of playing frequently to Her Majesty, and Signor Mascagni also played selections from some of his operas on one occasion. The pianoforte was supplied, as last year, by Mr. Bechstein.

REVIEWS.

The Music and Musical Instruments of Japan. By F. T. Piggott. (With notes by T. L. Southgate.) [Batsford.]

THE decorative arts of the East—of India, China, Japan—have rarely failed to charm and captivate the Western mind; and those of Japan in particular have, during the past thirty years, so successfully established themselves in our homes that we no longer think of them as exotics. Indeed, to such an extent have Japanese forms become acclimatised among us that our own artizans now reproduce them, and this without the least "intent to deceive." With this appreciation compare our attitude towards Eastern music—what a contrast! In India, for instance, there are two hundred and fifty-seven million souls—who, in Europe, knows or cares a straw about their music? Until two years ago, when Captain Day published his wonderful book, we were without even an intelligible account of its mysteries; and now that we can understand them, who, apart from a few specialists, troubles to do so? As to China and Japan, this is what her Majesty's Envoy, Sir Rutherford Alcock, wrote in 1863: "If I had not lived among the Chinese I should have said the Japanese had the least conception of either harmony or melody of any race yet discovered. The discord they both make when they set themselves to produce what they call music is something that baffles all description. Marrow-bones and cleavers are melodious in comparison." And Miss Bird, in Vol. II. of her "Unbeaten tracks in Japan," thus describes the music of an entertainment given in a private house: "Of the performance, as is fitting, I write with great diffidence. If I was excruciated and experienced twinges of acute neuralgia it may have been my fault. The performers were happy and the host's face showed no trace of anguish. Oriental music is an agonizing mystery to me." She adds: "Dr. Mueller says however—and he has studied the Japanese and their music intelligently—'If I am asked what impression our music makes upon the Japanese I am sure I shall not be far wrong in saying that they find it far more detestable than we do theirs. A prominent Japanese said, "Children, coolies, and women may find pleasure in European music, but an educated Japanese can never tolerate it."'" And yet there are people who speak of music as "the universal language"!! It is clear that whilst our eyes welcome the Entirely Strange, our ears do not. Why? Is it because the aural arts reflect far more faithfully than the visual our idiosyncrasies of thought and feeling? The fundamental differences between Eastern and Western minds are certainly shown less in the decorative arts than in music, and as the former meet with readier acceptance than the latter we are almost forced to this conclusion. Little as the music of the East generally has been understood among us, we have always known least of that of Japan. Even our most learned historians—Fétis, for instance—plead comparative ignorance of it. No serious effort to dispel this darkness had been made until Mr. Piggott took the matter in hand, during an official residence in Japan. The results of his studies were embodied in a paper read before the Asiatic Society of Japan, in January, 1891, and of this the present volume is an amplification. The opinions on Japanese music we have just quoted are not shared by Mr. Piggott. He, on the contrary, finds much to admire. It has "grace," it has "many beauties," it has "great merit." "It is not formless and void, but is built on an elaborate system of construction which, if its products were filled out with harmonies . . . would entitle it to a very favourable comparison with our own music. What Japanese music shows us is, as it were, the skeleton of construction; and I find it a very well knit and cleverly-articulated skeleton." Mr. Piggott divides his subject into three parts. In the first, its historical and social aspects are dealt with; the second treats of technical matters, and in the third the Japanese musical instruments are described; a few examples of the music itself are given, the reason that these are not more numerous being due to "the difficulties which stand in the way of reducing the music into Western written forms." "Much of the charm of the music—all its individuality nearly—depends upon its graceful and delicate phrasing, and though I think the Western notation capable of expressing these phrases (sic) to one who has already heard them, I feel a little uncertain whether their more complicated forms could be set down in it with sufficient accuracy to enable a stranger to interpret them satisfactorily. The Japanese musician learns this phrasing by ear." Some of the music—that for the biwa, a stringed instrument with frets, imported from China in the tenth century—has remained unchanged for over six hundred years. Like Western nations, the Japanese have classical, popular, ancient, and modern music. It is chiefly to the "ancient" music, Mr. Piggott says, that Japanese music owes its bad reputation. It is played by an orchestra of shōs, flutes, Hichirikis, drums, and gongs; and, "of all the gruesome sounds ever invented by man," says our author, "the Hichiriki gives forth the most unearthly." This "most villainous of vile-sounding instruments" (as he elsewhere describes it), which is sometimes also called "sad-toned tube," is the diapason of the old classical orchestra, and "the cacophony of the music must be visited on its head." Among the most interesting portions of the book are those relating to the musical scale of the Japanese, their system of tuning, their use of harmony, and their musical forms. The musician will here find ample food for reflection, especially if he compares Japanese habits in these particulars with those of other Eastern nations and of Ancient Greece. The volume is admirably printed, and contains a number of photographs of native performers and instruments. As the only authentic work on the subject it should be in the library of every musician who has learnt that musical interest and beauty are not confined to examples furnished by the nations of the West.

[Gand: Vuylsteke, 1894.]

This interesting episode in musical history is dedicated to one of the foremost of the younger musical archæologists, Herr Carl Krebs, and is the consequence of a few notes, at first written down in mere pastime, but ultimately elaborated into the interesting and important pamphlet now published. Much is known of Charles V., the Burgundian Prince and Roman Emperor, who ultimately forsook the world for a monastery, but the musical talent this great monarch possessed has not been much regarded, and it has waited for Mr. Vander Straeten to bring it into prominence and the recognition that should belong to it. His book is divided into twelve chapters:—Hereditary transmission, First lessons, A venerable face (Bredemers, the Emperor's music teacher), Organs and spinets, Songs and psalmody, At the concert and the ball, Minstrels of the palace, Instrumental bands, Three royal chapels, Dissonance, In retreat, and the Swan's song.

That Charles V. should have been musical was an almost necessary consequence of his descent. The Burgundian Princes had been famed for their musical followings and instrumental and manuscript collections. As a child he was sensible of the peculiar attraction of musical sounds. He was early taught to play upon the spinet, and when Bredemers became his teacher his progress was accelerated, and he soon became familiar with the motets of the Flemish school, at that time leading Europe. We now think of spinets and Flemish motets as old-world, belonging to the past, which is true; but with Charles they were fresh, appealing to contemporary ears as new inventions. Lutes and organs were also relatively novel from recent improvement and development. Bredemers had assisted in forming the primitive technique of the spinet and was one of the first to play, with skill, upon that instrument. The list of clavier or keyboard instruments acquired for the Imperial family is worthy of note. In 1508, a "manicorde" (clavichord), by Marc Mors of Antwerp, was obtained for Charles; in 1514 an organ by Antoine Mors for the Court; in 1515 an organ by the same maker for Charles, who also appears to have had two sent in the same year to the Hague, to serve his most noble pleasure in his private chapel. In 1516 a "clavicorde" (spinet) was ordered of the same Antoine Mors for the Princess Éléonore and an organ for Charles. In 1517 Henri Mors supplied an organ for Charles's journey to Spain, and so on until 1539 when "grand et petit positifs" were got from Étienne Lethmann for Charles—meaning large and small positive or chamber organs. Mr. Vander Straeten has preserved for us an interesting page of music with which Charles has been associated, entitled "Mille Regrets." The composition is not attributed to him, and in one form in which it has been preserved it was harmonised by Josquin Deprès; but the words and melody seem to have been identified with his youth, and to have been borne in mind by him as reflecting upon a time when "en bref mes jours finer" (sic). It forms one of Mr. Vander Straeten's music pages, and another contains the same air, dated 1538, with an accompaniment for the "Vihuela de mano" or old Spanish guitar; an early instance of accompanied monody, if the date is to be relied upon, but as the sharps are indicated it may be later. After a career of splendour, a single bell intoned the great Emperor's entrance as a monk into the Monastery of Yuste. Music went with him there; the choir was re-organised, old voices were replaced by fresh ones, and much of the glacial plainsong was banished in favour of admired motets of the more recent Flemish masters. Couriers travelled hither and thither to secure the much-desired sacred works. A censorship of intonation, accent, and style broke over the devoted heads of the brethren. It is said the Imperial ears were attentive to the shortcomings of the choir, through partly opened doors. Mr. Vander Straeten gives a page to a four-part composition attributed to Charles himself. It has long borne the name of the Imperial musician, and shows a serious acquaintance with counterpoint. A great musician, Guerrero, had visited Charles at Yuste, and a record has been found of a payment to him for "certain services." Mr. Vander Straeten pertinently asks if this was for compositions and travelling expenses? If so there need have been no mystery. Could these services have been bestowed upon motets composed by the monarch in retreat? That question cannot be answered.

Mr. Vander Straeten deserves our thanks for this interesting study. It is open to an English musical scholar to render his country a similar service by writing an Essay on our musical Tudor kings and queens, mirroring as faithfully the times in which they lived.

The Part-Song Book. Second Series, Nos. 698-703.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"When evening casts her shadows round," words and music by Clowes Bayley, begins in a hymn-like manner, but there is a bright and merry middle section, and it is a very pleasing part-song, which would be most effective without accompaniment, ending pianissimo. No. 699, "Magdalen at Michael's Gate," by Ethel M. Boyce, is a setting of lines by Henry Kingsley, brief, quaint, and effective in its unassuming way. "Queen of fresh flowers"—words by Reginald Heber, music by King Hall—is a very bright and tuneful ditty, quite in accordance with the present springtime; while, on the other hand, "Gentle sleep"—words by Mrs. Hemans, music by H. W. Schartau—is an agreeable lullaby well within the means of ordinarily well-trained choirs. Shakespeare's lines, "So sweet a kiss," from "Love's Labour's Lost," have been quietly but effectively set by George Sampson. The last of the series for the present is Dr. F. E. Gladstone's "A wet sheet and a flowing sea," words by Allan Cunningham, composed for and dedicated to the Highbury Philharmonic Society. This is a more elaborate composition than the preceding numbers, and an orchestral or pianoforte accompaniment is indispensable. It is a bright and breezy piece, with some effective contrapuntal writing, and is well worth the attention of choral societies, either small or large, for it is the work of a thorough musician. It should be added that most of these compositions should be sung without accompaniment when practicable.

The Orpheus. New Series. Nos. 264-273.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The revival of interest in glee singing is a noteworthy feature in musical circles at the present time, and new numbers of the time-honoured "Orpheus" are being issued in rapid succession. Brief reference to those indicated above must suffice. The first is "The shades of night,"

Blow, ye balmy breezes, blow.

BETHLEHEM

A MYSTERY

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

The Words written by Joseph Bennett.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

In paper boards, 6s.; Cloth, gilt, 7s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

His music is throughout refined, self-restrained, and reverent; if but a few of the "leading motives" (for this device is freely used) startle us by their originality, their treatment is always interesting, and the workmanship masterly.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

It overflows with music that is dramatic in the highest sense of the term, and it consequently shines as an example of admirable art. Concerning Dr. Mackenzie's technical methods there is nothing new to be said. All who are qualified to give the matter consideration have recognised his remarkable faculty for construction and elaboration. That faculty has not failed him in the case of his latest work. Every page of the score of "Bethlehem" marks the composer as a musician for whom culture has done its all—as one whom unflagging devotion to his art, coupled with a rare store of natural gifts, has led onwards to the power of giving complete expression to the musical ideas which come to him. . . . For our own part, we think that there are in "Bethlehem" many passages wherein the composer reaches his highest level; some, perhaps, where he soars even higher than he has done in the past. . . . A very beautiful scene is reached with the arrival at the manger-side of the adoring throng. Here is assuredly music that goes straight to the heart. . . . "Bethlehem" is brought to a close which leaves neither solidity, power, nor impressiveness to be desired. The ending, indeed, crowns nobly the beauties that have gone before.

STANDARD.

The work is remarkable from first to last for luminous musicianship and purity of style, and portions are equally noteworthy for freshness and charm. . . . On the whole, the second part is more pleasing than the first. After the opening we have a singularly charming song for the Virgin, entitled "In the Stable. The Blessed Mother singeth to her Babe," the first stanza of which is a translation by Coleridge of a Latin verse inscribed on a German picture of the Virgin and Child. Marked to be sung mezzo voce, this may be numbered among Dr. Mackenzie's most delightful inspirations. . . . The Finale is a very dignified ensemble, in which the composer pours forth all his resources, and, consequently, makes a splendid display of musicianship.

DAILY NEWS.

The musical utterances of the Shepherds are sometimes pastoral, sometimes in the style of the old masters, sometimes even grotesque, but always appropriate. Indeed, almost from first to last the Scottish composer seems to have caught the spirit of the text. There is no pedantic display of musicianship, although there is not a number which could have been written by any other than a cultured musician.

MORNING POST.

In the purely instrumental portions and those where the vocal parts are allotted to a single voice, Dr. Mackenzie is heard at his best. The opening section is one of these. Also the soprano solo, "Be not afraid," which abounds in beautiful phrases. An altogether delightful inspiration is the Cradle Song for soprano, with its delicately refined accompaniment for muted strings.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The literary excellence of the book is as apparent as is the text of "The Rose of Sharon" or "The Dream of Jubal," in which the author and composer previously joined with such happy results. Dr. Mackenzie has gone to work in the same spirit as his coadjutor. The pastoral style is largely resorted to, but when praise and thanksgiving are in question Dr. Mackenzie gives a free rein to the devotional fervour instinct in so many brilliant and impressive pages in the two works before referred to. Sublimity is not wanting when demanded at particular phases of the story, but the dominating idea has evidently been to appropriately illustrate the simplicity of the manifestation of the birth of the Saviour and the lowly surroundings presented to the gaze of the adoring throng. . . . The instrumentation is as picturesque, descriptive, and glowing as in either of Dr. Mackenzie's preceding works, whilst the choral passages, without offering any great difficulties, are sufficiently attractive to the executants to recompense them for special care in the enunciation of the varying sentiments of wonder, awe, and exultation. Taken as a whole, "Bethlehem" may be pronounced quite worthy its distinguished composer.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Dr. Mackenzie's music is throughout sincere in aim and ingenious in treatment. . . . he is at his best—as, for example, in the admirably impressive orchestral introduction, so suggestive of night and drowsiness; the extremely clever Oriental march; and the connecting instrumental passages generally. As regards the vocal numbers, special mention must be made of the charming Slumber Song of the Virgin, sung with great taste and effect by Miss Ella Russell; the angelic anthem "Glory to God," a masterly piece of part-writing for female chorus; and the well-wrought Finale for solo quartet and chorus which concludes the work. The orchestration, on which Dr. Mackenzie has evidently lavished especial care, is exceedingly rich, elaborate, and effective.

THE ATHENÆUM.

Dr. Mackenzie's latest utterance in oratorio—and his last, if we may place reliance on words probably uttered in haste—proves that his hand has lost nothing of the virility so splendidly manifested in "Jason," "The Rose of Sharon," and "The Dream of Jubal."

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

by J. Varley Roberts, a simple, but expressive evening song for voices in four parts. On the whole, similar in character, but rather more varied is "When evening casts her shadows round," by Clowes Bayley, a setting for male voices of a number of the "Part-Song Book" noticed above. No. 266, a Pastoral Ballad, by Josiah Booth, is an expressive, but not difficult setting of verses by Shenstone (1740). Robert Southey's lines, "The Well of St. Keyne," are very effectively illustrated in the next number, the composer being J. Frederick Bridge. Here we have a humorous little story with humorous music. The last six numbers for the present are Spohr's charming part-songs (Op. 90). The translations from the German are from the practised pen of the Rev. J. Troutbeck, and conductors of male voice choirs should make acquaintance with these pieces now that they are available in English.

Mediæval Music. An historical sketch by Robert Charles Hope, F.S.A., &c. [Eliot Stock.]

THE first thirty-five pages of this little volume deal with the music of Greece and Egypt, before the dawn of Christianity, the remaining 120 with the progress of the art in Europe from the first century to the seventeenth. Those who lack inclination, time, or opportunity for the perusal of larger works will find here a useful summary of the information they contain, with, in a few instances, brief discussions of knotty points on which doctors have disagreed. A fair amount of accuracy has been attained, but in the chapter entitled "The Music of Ancient Egypt and of the East generally" the information is given in such slipshod English that students are likely to be misled. For instance, on page 21 it is stated to have been "proved conclusively . . . . that the scale of ancient Egypt was the same as our own"; a little lower down we are told, "Their scale is assumed to have been diatonic," and on page 24 the music of the Egyptians (and Persians) is spoken of as "founded on the Arab scale, which itself is probably derived from the more ancient and complex system of the Hindoos, a system which divides its octave into twenty-two notes." Such a scale is most decidedly not "the same as our own." The author appears to have mixed up ancient with modern Egypt. On page 14, too, there is a sentence that betrays considerable confusion of thought: "Music is based on a trinity—sensation, rhythm, melody." These little defects can, however, easily be removed in future editions—of which we trust there will be many. The exceptionally complete equipment of this volume in the matter of indices, deserves acknowledgment. There are three—of things, names, and places, besides a bibliographical list of the works consulted.

Octavo Anthems, Nos. 442-446. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"HEAR my words, ye people," by Dr. Hubert Parry, is a lengthy and elaborate composition written for the Festival of the Salisbury Diocesan Choral Association. It is for soprano and bass solo, quartet, and chorus, and consists of several sections or movements. The writing is bold, free, and thoroughly English in character—in brief, quite worthy of Dr. Parry's high reputation as a writer of choral music. No. 443, "Try me, O God," by Arnold D. Culley, is a little anthem for male voices in four parts. It is melodious, simple, and rather sad in character, suitable therefore for Lent. On the other hand, No. 444, "Hark! news the angels bring," by Oliver King, is an effective but not difficult "carol-anthem" for Christmas, based on an ancient theme. No. 445, "Cleanse me, O Lord," by F. Wrigley, is for baritone solo and chorus; it is written with much smoothness of style and melodic feeling, and would be certain to please. No. 446, "Flee from evil," by the Rev. Walter J. Clarke, is for Lent or general use. It is grave and church-like in character, but certainly not dull, and it has the peculiarity of ending with a phrase for tenor solo.

Octavo Edition of Trios, &c., for Female Voices. Nos. 286—295. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. HENRY LAHEE'S "Ring out, wild bells," a setting of familiar words by Tennyson, is simply but charmingly written, and the accompaniment, suggesting a peal of bells, is very effective. No. 287 is the piquant number "Sorrow not, why art thou weeping?" for three solo voices and three-part chorus, from Gade's little-known but characteristic cantata "Comala." "Stars of the summer night," by John E. West, is, of course, yet another setting of Longfellow's oft-illustrated stanzas. It is a gracefully written and musicianly part-song in 9-8 time, the pianissimo close being especially charming. No. 289, "O worship the Lord," by S. S. Wesley, is the impressive quartet from the composer's fine anthem "Ascribe unto the Lord," of course, originally written for boys' voices. The next six numbers are by a German composer, Felix Woyrsch (Op. 34), the English words translated from quaint German originals, which are given, by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. For the most part the music is written in the old-world madrigalian spirit, but the penultimate number, "The Three Horsemen," is a thoroughly modern and somewhat humorous part-song. With the exception of the first they are for four voices, and would be more effective without than with accompaniment if sung with refinement.

Fourteen Pieces for the Violin. Composed by Henry Purcell. With pianoforte accompaniment by Arnold Dolmetsch. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE little pieces, which form No. 29 of Novello's "Albums for Violin and Pianoforte," should be in the portfolio of every patriotic violinist. They consist of a "Preludio," "Country Dance," "Hornpipe," "Canaries," "Trumpet tune," "Chacone," "Jigg," and numerous "Song-tunes" and "Aires," grave and gay, but all expressive of straightforward healthy sentiment, such as appealed to our forefathers, and which, happily, is still acceptable to the large majority of our countrymen to-day. Mr. Dolmetsch's accompaniments are admirably in keeping with the spirit of the music, and the marks of expression, bowing, and fingering are equally excellent and helpful.

School Songs. Books 11—23. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ABLY edited by Mr. W. G. McNaught, these song books have already shown that they fill a distinct want, for school music for the little ones, at once simple and free from vulgarity, is in greatly increasing demand. In the present instalment we have Kindergarten, action, sacred, and secular songs, the composers being Alfred Moffat, J. Hardcastle, E. Mundella, H. W. Schartau, Franz Abt, G. Ernest, F. A. Marshall, G. A. Macfarren, Roston Bourke, Arthur Richards, Dr. Roland Rogers, W. W. Pearson, A. S. Gatty, C. A. Macirone, and Sir John Stainer. Here, therefore, is plenty of variety, and it should be added that the music is printed both in Staff and Tonic Sol-fa notations, which of course increases the usefulness of the books.

THE programme of the Hereford Musical Festival, which will take place on September 11, 12, 13, and 14, will be, so far as is at present known, as follows:—Tuesday morning, "Elijah." Wednesday morning, Dvorák's Requiem Mass, together with a Symphony and Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants." In the evening, Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio (parts 1 and 2) and the "Creation" (parts 1 and 2). Thursday morning, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem" (part 2); Prelude to "Parsifal"; a new cantata, "The Cradle of Christ," by Dr. J. F. Bridge; and Spohr's "Last Judgment." In the evening, Dr. C. H. H. Parry's "Job" and the "Lobgesang." Friday morning, "The Messiah." A miscellaneous Concert will be given in the Shire Hall on the Tuesday evening, including a new cantata, "Sir Ogie and the Ladie Elsie," by Dr. C. H. Lloyd, and the Festival will conclude with a Chamber Concert in the Shire Hall on Friday evening. The artists already engaged are Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Robertson Sinclair will of course conduct.

A MUSICAL paper published in Brussels informs its readers that during the forthcoming Exhibition at Antwerp "the famous Children's Choir of the Albert Hall, London, under the direction of Monsieur Barnby," will give a Concert.

A SELECTION from Gounod's "Redemption" and Professor Bridge's "The Lord's Prayer" will be sung on Ascension Day, at 3 p.m., in Westminster Abbey.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Antwerp.—Rubinstein's opera "Nero" has been given here once more, at the Théâtre Royal, after an interval of seven or eight years, and created a considerable impression.

Basle.—Hans Huber's "Weltfrühling" (the World's Spring), a work in the style of a Liederspiel, the words by Rudolf Wackernagel, was produced recently at the Town Theatre and pleased very much.

Berlin.—Richard Strauss has been appointed Conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts for next season, in the place of the late Hans von Bülow.——On the 4th ult. a new Pianoforte Concerto in E flat minor, by a young Russian composer, S. Liapounoff, and a new Symphonic Poem for orchestra and organ, entitled "Easter," by Fritz Volbach, were produced at a "popular" Concert given by the Philharmonic Orchestra. Both works, but more especially the second, created a very favourable impression.——On the 5th ult. Mrs. Henschel, from London, gave a Lieder-Abend in the Bechstein Hall, and was accorded a most flattering reception.——Madame Albani gave a Concert at the Singakademie on the 5th ult., and was enthusiastically applauded. Miss Ethel Sharpe, late of the Royal College of Music, London, was also received with exceptional favour.——On March 29, the date of the funeral of the late Hans von Bülow, Brahms contributed the sum of 1,000 marks to the Pension Fund of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which his departed friend used to conduct.

Bochum.—"Die drei Grossmächte" (the three Great Powers), is the peculiar title of a new opera, by A. Grosse-Weischde, which was produced here on March 15. The libretto is founded on a novel by the well-known German novelist, Levin Schücking.

Bonn.—The Musical Festival to be held here, at the Beethoven Hall, on the 4th, 5th, and 6th inst., will be of a perhaps unique character. At three Concerts the whole of Beethoven's nine Symphonies will be played by the Cologne Gürzenich Orchestra, conducted by Professor Franz Wüllner. The three tremendous programmes are as follows: On the 4th inst., the Symphonies, Nos. 1, 2, and 3; on the 5th inst., Symphonies, Nos. 4, 5, and 6; and on the 6th inst., Symphonies, Nos. 7, 8, and 9. The prospectus of the Festival is headed: "Beethoven's Entwicklung al Symphoniker" (Beethoven's development as a composer of Symphonies).——Johannes Brahms has presented to the Beethoven House the MS., copied by Beethoven's father, of a cantata by Ph. E. Bach, upon which Beethoven, in whose possession it was for many years, has written: "Von meinen theuren Vater geschrieben" (written by my dear father).

Brussels. — Wagner's "Tristan" has at last been performed at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The long looked for and often deferred event took place on March 21, M. Cossira being the Tristan, Mdlle. Tanesy the Isolde, Mdlle. Wolf the Brangäne, M. Seguin the Kurwenal, and M. Lequien the King Marke. There seems to be little doubt that this opus summum of Wagner's genius bored the audience, which is perhaps not to be wondered at if it is true that, to quote Le Guide Musical, "the performance was but a sorry parody of the work," and that "this 'Tristan' resembled the real 'Tristan' as much as a chromo resembles a Rubens." Perhaps as an antidote to Wagner's masterpiece the director of the Monnaie revived Grétry's chef d'œuvre "Richard Cœur de Lion." The performance was, however, so wretched that the work was only played once.

Carlsruhe.—Verdi's "Falstaff" was given for the first time at the Court Theatre on March 11, with great success. Herr Plank, stoutest of singers, a veritable "round man," was admirable in the title part.

Casalmonferrato.—A new opera, "Gismonda Dalmonte," by Salvatore Sabatelli, was favourably received at its recent first performance.

Copenhagen.—On March 14 the Royal Orchestra, under the direction of Johan Svendsen, gave an interesting Concert in aid of a charity. The programme included a clever new Symphony in G minor by a young organist, Carl Nielsen, who played in the orchestra, and was repeatedly called at the finish. Another novelty was a Suite in five movements, and entitled "Oriental Scenes," by Professor Otto Malling, which was also received with much favour. Brahms's Violin Concerto and the "Meistersinger" Prelude completed the scheme. The King, the Queen, and several members of the royal family were present.

Elberfield.—Wagner's "Tristan" was, on March 8, performed for the first time at the Town Theatre here.

Florence.—At the Pergola Theatre here a lyric drama, "Etelinda," the words by A. T. Jessup, the music by a "Mr. Marion," was recently produced with great success. It is said that the composer's name is the nom de plume of the librettist's wife, Mrs. Jessup, neé Marion Minored, and that both are of American nationality. According to other accounts "Mr. Marion" is an Englishman.

Frankfort-on-Main.—E. Humperdinck's Märchenspiel "Hänsel und Gretel" has been added to the répertoire of the Opera House, and was, on March 11, given for the first time with brilliant success.——At the seventh Museum Concert, a new Concert-Overture, "In the Scottish Highlands," by Mr. Frederic Lamond, was produced and made a highly favourable impression.

Geneva.—At the Grand Theatre here a new lyric opera, "Janie," by E. Jacques-Dalcroze, was produced on March 13, It was very favourably received.

Gotha.—A young Scandinavian, Sigward Aspestrand, is the author of the words and music of a new three-act opera, "Die Seemannsbraut," which was produced here at the Court Theatre on the 1st ult., without, however, achieving more than a succès d'estime.

Hamburg.—A new three-act opera, with ballet, entitled "Die Welfenbraut," and composed by the Vienna composer, Alfred Zamara, was produced at the Town Theatre on March 20, and well received. The libretto deals with a historical subject, the German Emperor Henry VI. being one of the chief characters.——At the penultimate Concert of the Philharmonic Society a new symphonic prologue to Dante's "Divina Commedia," by Felix von Woyrsch, was produced with much success. Beethoven's Choral Symphony was played at the last of the Society's Concerts. The work had not been heard in its entirety in this very musical town for six years.——On March 29 the remains of the late Hans von Bülow were reduced to ashes (in accordance with the will of the deceased master) at the Crematorium. The urn was deposited on the following day in the Ohlsdorf Cemetery. Previously to the cremation an impressive funeral service was held in St. Michael's Church, at which the final chorus from Bach's Passion according to St. John, and a chorale from the same master's St. Matthew Passion Music, were sung. The Dead March from Handel's "Samson" ("Saul") was played while the coffin was carried out of the church, and when the procession passed the Town Theatre the orchestra of the latter, under Kapellmeister Mahler, performed another funeral march. At the Crematorium a male-voice choir sang the Molto Adagio ("Hymn to the Deity") from Beethoven's String Quartet (Op. 132), specially arranged, with appropriate words by Dr. H. Behn; and Schubert's "Litanei," arranged for male chorus with soprano solo, was sung as the body was committed to the flames.

Königsberg.—One of the baritones at the Town Theatre, here, Herr Emil Liepe, has written the words and music of a one-act opera, entited "Colomba," which was produced on March 20 with remarkable success. There are only three characters in the work, and no chorus is employed.

Leipzig.—"Robin Hood," an opera in three acts, by Albert Dietrich, was performed for the first time at the Town Theatre, on March 18, with very fair success. The work is not new; it was composed about twenty years ago, and produced at Frankfort-on-Main in 1879.

Madrid.—In place of the recently-deceased Señor Arrieta, the violinist, Monasterio, has been appointed Director of the Conservatoire of Music.

Mannheim.—Signor Puccini's opera "Manon Lescaut" was recently given here for the first time, but made no impression.

Marseilles.—The latest thing in lyric drama is a "Chinese" opera, in five acts and seven tableaux. Its title is "Taï-Tsoung." The libretto is by M. Ernest d'Hervilly, the music by M. Emile Guimet, and it was produced at the Grand Théâtre here on the 11th ult. The plot deals with an episode in Chinese history, the superb decorations were strictly accurate, the costumes copied from real Chinese teapots and saucers, real Chinese melodies were introduced—and yet the public was not quite happy.

Milan.—Signor Franchetti's new opera, "Fior d'Alpe," was not a success when it was recently produced at the Scala Theatre. The composer was only called about half-a-dozen times.——Eugen d'Albert gave two Pianoforte Recitals here at the invitation of the Società del Quartetto, and created a profound impression with his magnificent performances.——Messrs. G. Ricordi and Co., the well-known music publishers, announce that they have commissioned seven Italian composers to write an opera each. Four of them have already been supplied with librettos. They are Signor Enrico de Leva, Gaetano Luporini, Giacomo Puccini, and Cesare Galeotti; while the works on which they are engaged will be called "La Camarozo," "Pasqua de' fiori," "La Bohême," and "Anton" respectively. Signori Mascagni, Leoncavallo, and Franchetti are the other composers selected by the firm. It would be interesting to know definitely how many works the author of that Intermezzo has at present in hand.

Monte Carlo.—Mr. Isidore de Lara's opera "Amy Robsart" was given at the Theatre here on March 30, with Madame Sembrich in the title-rôle.

Munich.—Richard Strauss, of Weimar, one of those gifted young conductors of which Germany seems to possess such an abundance, has been engaged for the Court Theatre here, and will conduct some of the forthcoming Wagner performances.——The seventh Subscription Concert of the Musical Academy, on March 9, was devoted entirely to works by Edvard Grieg, and conducted by the composer. The programme included the Pianoforte Concerto, the first "Peer Gynt" Suite, the two Elegiac melodies for strings, and three movements from the music to "Sigurd Jorsalfar." Needless to say the favourite composer was the recipient of enthusiastic applause.——The following are the artists already engaged for the Wagner performances to be given at the Court Theatre between August 8 and October 2: Mesdames Katharina Bettaque, Bianca Bianchi, Victoria Blank, Johanna Borchers, Pauline de Ahna, Lili Dressler, Emanuela Frank, Katharina Greve-Klafsky, Kornelia Meysenheym, Fanny Moran-Olden, Margaretha and Pauline Sigler, Gisela Staudigl, Milka Ternina, and Mathilde Wekerlin; Messrs. Max Alvary, Alfred Bauberger, Kaspar Bausewein, Theodor Bertram, Otto Brucks, Anton Fuchs, Karl Grengg, Heinrich Gudehus, Eugen Gura, Sebastian Hofmüller, Heinrich Knote, Theodor Mayer, Max Mikorey, Karl Nebe, Fritz Plank, Theodor Reichmann, Otto Schelper, Gustav Siehr, Heinrich Vogl, Raoul Walter, and Heinrich Wiegand. This list contains the names of many of the foremost Wagner singers of Germany; Frau Rosina Sucher, Fräulein Therese Malten, Messrs. Scheidemantel, Perron, and Lieban being, perhaps, the most notable omissions.

Odessa.—A new opera, by a new Russian musician, M. Rebikoff, was produced here some weeks ago with considerable success. It is a long one-act opera with Intermezzo obbligato, and is entitled "In the Storm." It is the composer's first attempt and promises well for his future.

Paris.—The Concerts conducted on March 16 and 23 at the Châtelet by Felix Mottl, of Carlsruhe, and Hermann Levi, of Munich, respectively, were both successful. The performances of works by Berlioz, Wagner, and Beethoven, under the direction of German conductors, are acknowledged by the Paris press to have been veritable revelations. ——Gounod's posthumous "Requiem," the composition to which the master was putting the finishing touches when death overtook him, was produced at the Concert spirituel at the Conservatoire on Good Friday. The work proved interesting enough, but the general opinion seems to be that it will add nothing to the fame of the author of "The Redemption" and "Mors et Vita." At the same Concert Brahms's six-part chorus, "Gesang der Parzen," was performed for the first time in France. We need hardly add that this almost too sombre work was not to the taste of the audience.——On the 18th ult. Verdi's "Falstaff" was given for the first time at the Opéra Comique, in the presence of the veteran composer and a brilliant audience. The performance was superb; M. Maurel as the unwieldy hero and Mdlle. Delna as Mistress Quickly were especially good; while the orchestra, considerably enlarged for the occasion, did full justice, under M. Danbé, to its difficult but delightful task. M. Soulacroix was the Ford, M. Clement and Madame Landouzy the two lovers, and Mdlle. Grandjean the Alice. Several numbers had to be repeated, and the whole performance was a triumph for the wonderful man who, at eighty, could compose such a chef d'œuvre.

Pavia.—Signor Alfredo Soffredini has written the words and music of a three-act opera, or rather "Episodio storico-romantico," entitled "Salvatorello," which was produced at the Guidi Theatre here, on March 26, with much success.

Prague.—At the German Theatre here a new two-act opera, "Etelka," by a young Italian composer, Crescenzo Buongiorno, was produced on March 13 with very good success.——A bust of Friedrich Smetana was placed in the vestibule of the Bohemian National Theatre on March 31. After the ceremony a Festival performance (the 259th) of the lamented composer's opera "The Sold Bride" was given.

Stuttgart.—On March 11 the hundredth performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" at the Court Theatre was given.

Vienna.—On March 6 a new law respecting the performing rights in stage plays was passed by the Upper House (Herrenhaus). Henceforth performing right in Austria will last for thirty years after the author's death, instead of the ten years stipulated by the law of 1846. For this important alteration all who will profit by it have to thank Madame Cosima Wagner (and her late husband's fame), for it was she who appealed direct to the Emperor of Austria when the performing right in "Parsifal" was threatened.——On the 14th ult. Anton Rubinstein conducted a performance of his sacred opera "Moses," given by the Society of the Friends of Music. ——The Coburg prize opera, "Die Rose von Pontevedra," by Jos. Foster, was recently performed for the first time at the Court Theatre, and was brilliantly successful. Fräulein Paula Mack, the latest and youngest star in the local operatic heavens, was admirable as the Rose.

Weimar.—Felix Mottl's opera "Prince and Singer" was performed for the first time at the Court Theatre on March 9, and very warmly received.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Our season here may now be understood as fairly over, though a little erratic adventuring in ways musical is still promised for a time. Perhaps the greatest success, to "count by heads," was achieved at the performance, on Good Friday, of "The Redemption," by the Midland Musical Society. The seating capacity of the Town Hall was tested to its utmost, and the usual hundreds, on such occasions of furore, were turned away. The performance itself was but an incomplete, apologetic one. Not so large an attendance was that at the better performance of "The Messiah," on Easter Monday, by Mr. Halford's Choral Society. A Concert, given by the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir—fresh from their honours at the Chicago World's Fair—took place on the 2nd ult., Madame Clara Novello Davies being Conductress.

At Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concert, of the 5th ult.—the final one of the series—Dr. Parry's "Hypatia" music, which had been deferred from the previous Concert owing to the illness of the composer, came to its hearing. Dr. Parry himself conducted. Six movements — the most important numbers of the incidental music written for the production of the play at the Haymarket Theatre—were given, making a rather long suite de pièces. The work, exacting of its kind, was listened to from beginning to end with unflagging attention and appreciation, and the composer received the usual ovation which our public generally accords its musical favourites.

The next important piece of the programme was an "Allegro Pathétique" in F sharp minor for violin, by H. W. Ernst, performed by Mr. Willy Hess. We had not heard this work before, and, admirably performed as it was, it made a great impression. It is one of enormous difficulty, but, unlike so many compositions only performable by virtuosi, its musical merits are in the proper ratio with its technical difficulties. Most masterly, indeed, is the blending of melodic sweetness, impassioned expression, and figurative display. It would properly rank as the first movement of a Concerto; the orchestral accompaniment is fuller and more elaborate than is common in works of this class. Mr. Edward German's music to "Henry VIII.," or rather three dances therefrom (Morris dance, Shepherd's dance, and Torch dance), proved vastly to the liking of the audience. It is, indeed, very clever, agreeable music. Madame Clara Samuell was the vocalist of the evening. She sang Rossini's "Bel Raggio"; but more interesting to us were a couple of very pretty songs by Max Stange ("Cradle-song" and "Damon"), quite a treat after so many hackneyed specimens of vocal compositions. We may mention that though this was the last of Mr. Stockley's Concerts of this season, it is yet proposed by the members of the orchestra to give their worthy Conductor "a complimentary Concert in appreciation of his indefatigable efforts to establish a local orchestra, and in a measure to recoup him for some of his monetary losses in carrying on these Concerts for so many years." The programme on this occasion is to be made up of works preferred by plebiscite.

The Birmingham String Quartet party has given its final Concerts. Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1.), Svendsen's Quartet in A minor (Op. 1), and Grieg's Pianoforte Sonata in E minor were among the chief pieces.

The Festival Choral Society has now commenced in earnest its preparations for the important event which forms its prime raison d'être. At present it is engaged chiefly, if not altogether, upon the classic works (Cherubini's Mass, &c.), selected for festival performance. It is yet too soon for the "commissioned" works to be in hand; but possibly in our next report we may have more information to supply upon this head.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The most important Concert during the month was that of the Bristol Choral Society, which took place in Colston Hall on the 4th ult.; but the attendance was by no means commensurate with the excellence of the performance. The German "Requiem" of Brahms, which has before been given by the Society, was again brought forward, together with Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," and choruses from Handel's "Israel in Egypt." With these three works the members are thoroughly familiar, and the interpretation was excellent. Miss Florence Cromey and Mr. Ferguson were the soloists in the "Requiem." The other composition in the Concert scheme was a well-conceived and skilfully wrought Symphonic Suite in C, from the pen of Mr. P. Napier Miles, a cultured Bristol amateur who has received his training under the guidance of Dr. C. Hubert Parry. The work was, on the whole, excellently interpreted by the band (led by Mr. Carrington and directed by Mr. Riseley), and was received with demonstrative applause, which the author came to the platform to acknowledge.
